PREFACE.

CONSIDERING the very long acquaintance which we have fo happily maintained with the Public, a Preface to our Twenty-eighth Volume feems a very unneceffary ceremony. Even acknowledgments of kindnefs and professions of gratitude become tirefome by a continued repetition; and yet, if custom has rendered fuch an introduction neceffary, and it is expected that we fhould fay fomething upon the fubject, how can we possibly refrain from the genuine expression of our sentiments, under the ftrong impreffions which the liberal and unvarying favour of that Public, through fo long a course of years, has indelibly stamped upon us ? The proper manifestation, however, of our gratitude, will be in act and not in words; in using our utmost exertions still to preferve the Annual Register in that ftyle of reputation and character, which has hitherto procured it fuch marked diffinction and fo unlimited a patronage,

As the year of which we treat did not fuperabound in political events of great general importance, and was happily free from the dazzling brilliance of military exploits, these circumstances 8 afforded afforded us an opportunity, which we gladly embraced, of completing our retrofpect of fuch matters of confideration, as the excels and urgency of matter in late bufy years, had neceffarily occafioned our postponing. Of these, the public affairs of our fifter island and kingdom, not only claimed the first place from our mutual relation and interest, but demanded it on the account of fuperior importance to all others. We have likewife brought into view no fmall fhare of curious and interefting matter from the transactions of foreign nations, which feemed hitherto to have been overlooked. Spain, in particular, has, through the great improvements which for fome time have been taking place in that kingdom, afforded a most pleasing and fertile field for retrospect. Nor have other countries, apparently more sterile, been by any means unproductive. In the business of the present year, the exceedingly complicated affairs of Holland, prefented fo alarming an afpect, and indicated confequences by which the interests and even fecurity of this country might have been to deeply affected, that their difcuffion neceffarily required our utmost care and most ferious attention.

E have already feen, that by feveral acts of parliament which paffed in the vear 1780, the commerce of Ireland was freed from those ruinous restrictions with which it had been long shackled, through the shortfighted policy and narrow prejudices. of the British nation.

In the year 1782, the declaratory act of George the Second was repealed; and by another flatute, which passed in the following year, the authority of the Britith parliament, in all matters both of legiflation and jurifdiction, were renounced, and the political independence of the kingdom of Ireland was compleatly eftablished.

The only object therefore that remained for the confideration of the refpective governments of each country, was the fettlement of a fyllem of commercial intercourfe betwixt the two kingdoms upon a firm and permanent bafis.

Before we enter upon this part of our history, it may be necessary to take a short retrospective view of the internal state of affairs in that country.

The fpirit of reforming the conflitution, by flortening the duration of parliaments, and establishing a more equal representation of the people, which broke out in Great Britain about the year 1779, passed over at the fame period into the kingdom of Ireland.—It has always been queftioned, whether any confiderable part of the people of England, however unpopular the houfe of commons may at times have rendered itfelf to the nation, was at all diffatisfied with the effablifhed mode of reprefentation, or expected any effectual relief from the more frequent return of elections.

In Ireland, these projects of reformation certainly met with a much more general reception—a circumflance not difficult to be accounted for, when we confider the ferment which then existed in that kingdom, and how favourable such moments are to every species of political innovation.

In the year 1779, the parliament of Ireland, in their address to the throue, had in firm and manly language demanded the reftoration of their commercial freedom. In crder to give effect to this requisition, refolutions were entered into by the inhabitants of the trading towns to prevent the importation of British manufactures ; and thefe refolutions were often enforced with a degree of violence and cutrage, which the civil authority of the country was unable to regrain. This vigorous and determined fpirit of the people had a forcible effect upon the deliberations of parliament; all new fupplies for the current fervices of the executive government were de-, nied, nied, and the truft of the old revenue, which had ufually been voted for two years, was refirited to fix months.—A mutiny bill was alfo paffed for the king's army in Iteland, which before had always been regulated under the authority of an act of the Britifli legiflature.—Thefe vigorous' measures, as we have already feen in the transactions of the year 1780, produced their intended effect, and led to ftill more important confequences.

The paffing of the mutiny bill was a ftep that went in its principle fo evidently and fo directly to the acknowledgment of the independence of the kingdom of Ireland, that it is not eafy to conceive how it came to meet with fo little oppofition from administration, or to receive fo readily the fanction of the British cabinet, unless we suppose that the circumftance of its being made perpetual had rendered it acceptable to government. But in Ireland, where one great conflitutional principle appears to have been facrificed merely for the purpose of eftablishing another, it was easy to forefee that they would not long fubmit to a refriction which rendered the advantage they had obtained not only not ufeful, but dangerous to their conflictation.

Accordingly in the following feffion an attempt was made to get rid of the cbnoxious part of the bill, by repealing the claufe of perpetuity. But here government made a fland; and this, as well as a motion made to obtain a modification of Poyning's law, was rejected by a large majority.

The failure of these efforts of the misority in parliament, appears to have given occasion to the first meeting of the volunteers on the fubject of parliamentary reform. Dec. 28th, On the 28th of Decem-1781. ber, 1781, the officers of one of the Ulifer regiments came to an unanimous refolution, " That " to reftore the conflictation to its " original purity, the most vigorous " and effectual methods should be " purfued to root corruption and " court influence out of the legifla-" tive body :" and with this view a meeting of delegates from the feveral regiments of the province was convened at Dungannon on the 15th of February following.

On that day the reprefentatives of 143 corps of volunteer troops aftembled. Their refolutions, which were adopted in fubflance by all the volunteers of the fouthern provinces, were confined for the most part to the affertion of the political independence of the kingdom.—This primary object being foon after eftablifned, by folemn acts of the legillature of both nations, the ardour for parliamentary reformations appeared for a while to have almost entirely fubfided*.

The existence and increase of the volunteer army, after the necessity which first gave rife to it had been fuperceded

* During the course of this, the Irish parliament passed the following acts, for the purpose of giving effect to their new constitution :

An act to empower the lord lieutenant, or other chief governor or governors, and council of this kingdom, for the time being, to certify all fuch bills, and none other, as both houfes of parliament fhall judge expedient to be enacted in this kingdom, to his majefty, his heirs and fucceflors, under the great feal of Ireland, without addition, diminution, or alteration. All fuch bills, thus transfinited, and  $[\mathcal{A}] a$  fuperceded by the establishment of peace, and after the great conftitutional objects to which it had fecondarily directed its views were fully attained, called for the most ferious attention of government .---Accordingly, foon after the tranfactions we have just related, an attempt was made to induce them to difband, by raifing under the authority of government 2 kind of national militia, by the name of Fencible Regiments.-It is probable that this defign, though too glaring to be concealed, and accordingly almost univerfally condemned and opposed by the volunteers, would in time have produced its effect, if fome new object had not been found upon whichthe united efforts of that body might again be exerted .- The reform of parliamentary representation furnished this centre of union, and the discussion of it was again refumed with great zeal and folemnity .--Delegates are affembled from the feveral corps of the feveral provinces; committees of correspondence are appointed ; and letters \* are difpatched to the most celebrated political fpeculators, or parliamentary reformers in Great Britain, for their advice on fo great and momentous an occafion.

On the eighth day of September, 1783, a general meeting of delegates from the province of Ulfter was held at Dungannon. A plan of reformation was here propoled and agreed upon; and it was refolved, that a grand national convention of reprefentatives from the whole volunteer army fhould affemble at Dublin on the tenth day of November following. In these measures the volunteer corps of the other three provinces almost unanimously concurred.

The convention in Dublin was both full and respectable, and the measures were at least commendable for their moderation. On the fubject of parliamentary reform, it was proposed to extend the right of voting in all cities and boroughs to every protestant inhabitant possessed of a freehold or leafehold, for 31 years or upwards, of the value of forty shillings a year; that in decayed boroughs, where the number of voters fhould be lefs than two hundred in the province of Ulfter, one hundred in Muniter and Connaught, and feventy in the province of Leinfter, returned under the great feal of Great Britain, without addition, diminution, or alteration, and none other, to pafs in the parliament of this kingdom. No bill neceffary to be certified into Great Britain as a caufe or confideration for holding a parliament in Ireland.

An act to limit the mutiny act to two years, and to repeal the other obnoxious parts of the late flatute.

An act providing that from henceforth all erroneous judgments, orders, and decrees, shall be finally examined and reformed in the high court of parliament of this kingdom only; and that for this purpose the lord licutenant, or other chief governor or governors, shall and may grant warrants for fealing writs of error re-turnable into perliament.

An habeas corpus law, and one for rendering the judges independent of the erown, were also enacted.

* Thefe letters were addressed to the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Effingham, Mr. William Pitt, Mr. Wyvil, Major Cartwright, Dr. Price, and Dr. John Jebb. the neighbouring parifies fhould be admitted to a right of voting; and laftly, that the duration of parliaments fhould be limited to three years.

Mr. Flood undertook to bring forward the difcuffion of these topics in the Houfe of Commons; and accordingly, the day following, he moved for leave to bring in a bill ** for the more equal reprefentation " of the people in parliament." The motion was received by a great majority of the houfe with the ftrongeft marks of difapprobation. Without entering into the confideration of the wifdom or folly of the plan proposed, it was urged that the house could not possibly, without betraying its truft, and abdicating its authority, confent to receive propositions tendered to them at the point of the bayonet, by a body of armed men. That however respectable they might be in other points of view, yet to fuffer them to befet the house of parliament, and to dictate to the legislature with arms in their hands, would be to effablifh a precedent fubverfive of the very existence of all order and government.

The motion being rejected by a majority of 157 to 77, the houfe came to a refolution, which was moved by Mr. Yelverton, the attorney general, " That it was now " neceflary to declare, that the " houfe would fupport the rights " and privileges of parliament a-" gainit all encroachments." An addrefs was alfo ordered to be prefented to the king, on the motion of Mr. Conolly, " to exprefs the " happinefs they enjoyed under the " eftablifhed government, and to " affure him of their determination " to support the prefent conflitu-" tion with their lives and for-" tunes." The address being fent up to the House of Lords, received their concurrence.

On the report of these measures to the convention by Mr. Flood, it was agreed, that a counter-addrefs fhould be prefented to the king, in the name of the delegates of all the volunteers of Ireland, " to im-" plore his majefty, that their hum-" ble with to have certain manifest " perversions in the parliamentary " representation of that kingdom " remedied, might not be imputed " to any fpirit of innovation, but " to a fober and laudable defire to " uphold the conftitution, to con-" firm the fatisfaction of their fel-" low-fubjects, and perpetuate the " cordial union of the two na-" tions."

The change which foon afterwards took place in the administration of both kingdoms, gave fresh spirits to the friends of reformation. It was not unreasonably expected that the weight of government would now be thrown into their fcale, as the first minister in England, and the first minister in Ireland *, had been among the most eager and loud in support of the same measures in Great Britain. But notwithstanding these flattering appearances, they were doomed to experience a fecond disappointment.

On the 13th of March 1784, Mr. March 13th, Flood again moved 1784.

for leave to bring in his bill; as the motion was fupported by a great number of petitions, and all occafion of offence was avoided, by * Mr. Pitt, and the Duke of Rutland.

keeping the volunteers out of view; the bill was allowed to be brought in, but, on the fecond reading, it was rejected by nearly the tame majority as before.

These repeated defeats did not abate the ardour of the Irifh retormers in the purfuit of their favourite object; but as all hope of obtaining the deliberate co-operation of parliament was at an end, they turned their applications to a quarter from whence experience had already taught them to look for more effectual exertions; as government had not yet ventured to question the legality of the volunteer affociations, the people at large were called upon to provide themfelves with arms, and to array themfelves under that defcription. Several unpopular acts of the new government, in fome of which parliament was also involved by the fhare it had in them, ferved greatly to increase the general discontent of the nation.

June 7th. On the 7th day of June 7th. June a meeting was held of the aggregate body of the citizens of Dublin. It was here refolved to prefent another petition to the king, and in the mean time to endeavour, by a circular addrefs, to flimulate the body of the people to a general and vigorous exertion.

The petition, after enumerating their feveral grievances, and lamenting that his majefly's adminifiration fhould have taken an aftive part in all the meafures of which they complained, flates, "That this " was a circumflance the more ex-" traordinary, as the first minister " of England had virtuously de-" clared himfelf in favour of the " principal meafure which had been " rejected; that his majefty had " lately thought it necessary to ap-" peal to the electors of Great Bri-" tain against the power of an arif-" tocracy; that on that occasion " but one fourth of the people of " England exclaimed against their " House of Commons, and the fo-" vereign prudently diffolved a par-" liament which had loft the confi-" dence of a quarter of the na-" tion, and declared his readines " to adopt whatever he should col-" left to be the fense of his people; " and that they therefore looked " up to him with the utmost confi-" dence for the immediate diffolu-"tion of the parliament of Ire-" land, in compliance with the al-" most unanimous request of his " loyal fubjects of that kingdom."

In the addrefs, the complicated hardships they had fuffered from the abule of power were detailed with great warmth and freedom; the continuance of these fufferings they attribute to the defects of their reprefentation in parliament; and they appeal to experience for the inefficacy of every means they had employed to obtain redrefs. They therefore call upon and conjure their fellow-fubjects to unite with them in the purfuit of fome more efficacious plan for the removal of the general calamity; and with this view they propole that five perfons should be elected from each county, city, and confiderable town, to meet in Dublin in national congrefs.

But the most remarkable feature in this address was, a proposition to admit the Roman catholic subjects of that kingdom to a participation in the rights of suffrage at the election of members of parliament. Though this measure was not only confonant confonant to the general principles of the reform they meditated, but promifed no fmall acceffion of itrength to the common caufe, yet the fincerity of the Irith proteftants on this point, farther than as it ferved the prefent turn, has been much doubted.

In a former volume we had occafion to remark, as one of the confequences of the general calamity in which the late war had involved the country of Ireland, that the prejudices entertained against the papifts in that kingdom appeared, in fome degree, to be giving way to more liberal, wife, and equitable fentiments. The volunteers, at a very early period, expressed their abhorrence of the unjust and impolitic treatment of fo great a majority of their fellow-fubjects; they recommended their caufe to the attention of the legislature, and, in fome counties, even invited them to range themfelves under the fame banners in the field. But the great political objects then in view being obtained, no other relief was granted to the catholics, than the repeal of a few of the most cruel and oppreflive claufes in the laws enacted against them *.

When the bufinefs of equal reprefentation began to be agitated, the cafe of the Roman catholics was again brought forward, and the delegates of the meeting at Dungannon, in the year 1783, were inftructed to confider of the best plan of admitting them to an equal participation in the benefits of the projected reformation. At the fubfequent meeting of the convention in Dublin, when that fubject was proposed for their confideration, a pretended letter was produced from the Earl of Kenmare, purporting to convey the general fentiments of the Roman catholics of Ireland, in which they were made to express their perfect fatisfaction with what had been already done for them, and that they defired no more than peaceably to enjoy the privileges they had obtained. But though this letter was publicly difavowed, both by the respectable person from whom it was faid to have come, and by a general affembly of the committee of the Irifh catholics, who acknowledged themfelves to have too great a refemblance to the reft of their species to be defirous of opposing any thing that tended to their relief, and that they should

* By an aft paffed in 1778, Roman catholics were empowered to take leafes for any term of years, not exceeding nine hundred and ninety-nine, or for any term of years determinable on any number of lives, not exceeding five. They were now enabled to purchafe or take by grant, limitation, defent, or devife, any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, in this kingdom, with certain exceptions, and to difpole of them by will or otherwife; to defeend according to the courfe of common law, devifable and transferable in like manner as the lands of proteftants. By the fame law, certain penal afts refpecting the hearing and the celebrating of m. is; forbidding Roman catholics to keep a horfe of or above the value of five pounds; empowering grand juries to levy from them, in their refpective diffricts, money to the amount of fuch loffes as were fuftained by the depredations of privateers; requiring them to provide in towns proteftant watchnen; and forbidding them to inhabit the city of Limerick, or fuburbs, were repealed.

So much of the former acts as forbad them to teach fehool publicly, or to inftruct youth of their own profession in private, was also repealed; and a law enacted to permit them to have the guardianship, the care, and the tuition of their own children, receive any indulgence the legilature fhould be willing to grant them, yet, in the plan of reformdigefied at this meeting, they were left precifely in the fame fituation as before.

But to return to the proceedings of the citizens of Dublin.—An application was made to the lord lieutenant to convey their petition to the throne. In anfwer to their requeft, he informed them, that though it was his duty to convey the papers they prefented, yet he found himfelf obliged to accompany them with his entire difapprobation; as they contained unjuft and indecent reflections upon the laws and the parliament of Ireland, and as they tended to foment fatal diffentions among the people.

The credulity of the Irifh reformers was proof against all difapprobation. They could not be perfuaded, but that the English minifter would heartily concur in the fupport of meafures founded on principles which he had bimfelf fo often and fo oftentatioufly avowed. Accordingly, on the 8th July 8th. of July, a petition to the king was conveyed to Mr. Pitt, by the inhabitants of Belfast, nearly of the fame tenor with that of the citizens of Dublin. In the month of September, Mr. Pitt informed them, in his anfiver, " That he had " undoubtedly been, and ftill con-" tinued, a zealous friend to a re-" form in parliament, but that he " must beg leave to fay, that he " had been fo on grounds very dif-" ferent from those adopted in their " petition. That what was there " proposed, he confidered as tend-" ing to produce ftill greater evils " than any of those which the " friends of reform were defirous " to remedy."

But the caufe of reform received about this time a more fatal blow, from the difusion which broke out amongit the volunteers themfelves, ou the subject of admitting the Roman catholics to the rights of election. In an addrefs prefented by the Ulfter corps to their general, the Earl of Charlemout, after fome ftrong expressions of their detestation of ariflocratic tyranny, they hint at the necoffity of calling in the aid of the catholics, as the most just as well as effectual means of opposing it with fuccefs. In answer to this addrefs, the Earl of Charlemont lamented that, for the first time, he felt himfelf obliged to differ from them infontiment. He was free from every illiberal prejudice against the catholics, and full of good will towards that very refpectable body; but he could not refrain from the most ardent entreasies that they would defift from a purfuit that would fatally clog and impede the profecution of their favourite purpofe.

As this nobleman was very highly and very defervedly refpected by the whole nation, his opinion was eagerly embraced, both by the timid, whole apprehenfions were alarmed by the beldnefs and extent of the project, and by a great number whole prejudices againft the catholics appear rather to have been diffembled than cured. In the month of October, the thanks of the corporation of the city of Dublin was voted him for his conduct on this occafion.

The meeting of a national congrefs, was a measure of too alarming a nature, not to attract the most ferious attention of government; and it appears to have been their refolution to take the most vigorous Reps for preventing it if possible. A few

A few days previous to that which was fixed for the election of delegates for the city of Dublin, the attorney-general addreffed a letter to the theriffs, exprcfling his very great furprife at having read a fummons, figned by them, calling a meeting for the purpole in question. He observed, that by this proceeding, they had been guilty of a most outrageous breach of their duty; and that if they proceeded, they would be responsible to the laws of their country, and he should hold himfelf bound to profecute them in the court of King's Bench, for a conduct which he confidered fo highly criminal, that he could not overlook it. These threats fucceeded fo far as to intimidate the fheriffs from attending the meeting in their official capacity; but the meeting was neverthelefs held, delegates were chosen; and in revenge for the attorney's letter, feveral itrong refolutions were agreed to, relative to the right of affembling themfelves for the redrefs of grievances.

But government, having once fet their faces against the election and assembling of delegates, pursued a mode of conduct that had sufficient of resolution in it at least. From denouncing threats, they proceeded to actual punishments.

Henry Stephens Reiley, Efq. high theriff for the county of Dublin, in confequence of his having called together and prefided at an affembly of freeholders, who met on the Aug. 19th. 19th of August 1784, for the purpole of choofing and infiruding their delegates, was the first object of minifterial profecution on this occasion. The attorney-general proceeded against him by attachment from the cent of King's Bench. The affembly, and the refolutions they came to on this occafion, figned by Mr.Reiley, in his character of theriff for the county, were both declared to be illegal, and Mr. Reiley was fentenced by the court to pay a fine of five marks (31. 6s. 8d.) and to be imprifoned one week.

This mode of legal procefs, except for the purpole of bringing perfons before the court, to receive the fentence of fuch court for contempt of and dilobedience to its orders and directions, has fo feldom been reforted to, that even the legality of the procefs itfelf, on any other ground than the one above mentioned, has remained a matter of general doubt and uncertainty.

In the prefent cafe it met with much lefs opposition than might have been expected. Clamours without doors, and debates within, on the subject, there certainly were, but both too feeble and ill-concerted to promife any fuccefs.

It is probable too, that the apprehenfions that many perfons began to form of the delegates themfelves, whom they looked upon in fome meafure as a new order rifing up in the flate, might induce them to acquiefce in, if not to approve of, an extraordinary and unufual mode of proceeding on this occakon.

But government did not confine their profecutions to Mr. Reiley.— Having once adopted a mode of proceeding, which fo effectually anfiwered the end for which they defigned it, informations were moved for, and attachments granted againfi the different magifirates who called the meetings, and figned the refpective refolutions of the freeholders in the counties of Refcommon and Leitrim. At the fume time, time, the prefs too came under the fath of the attorney-general; and the printers and publifiers of fuch news-papers as had inferted the obnoxious refolutions, fuffered with the magistrates who had figued them.

Notwithflanding thefe violent meafores which administration were purfuing, the national congress met, puriuant to its appointment, on the 25th day of October. Oct. 25th. But as it was far from being compleat in point of number, and leveral of its most respectable members chose to abfent themselves, they adjourned, after having paffed a number of refolutions to the faine purport with those which had been agreed to at the previous meeting ; and exhorted, in the most earnest manner, the communities which had not fent reprefentatives, if they refnected their own conliftency, if they wished for the fuccefs of a parhamentary reform, and as they tendered the perpetual liberty and prosperity of their country, not to let pais this opportunity of effecting the great and necessary confirmation of the conflicution.

At their fecond meeting, which was held on the 2d of January 2d, January 1785, the re-1785. prefentatives of twenzy-feven counties, and of most of the cities and confiderable towns of the kingdom, amounting in the whole to upwards of two hundred verfons, affembled. Their proceedings appear to have been of the fame nature as those they had before adopted, with only this difference, that in the proposed application to the Houfe of Commons, it was agreed to confine themfelves to the most general terms, and to leave the mode of redrefs as free and open as possible to the confideration of parliament. After feveral adjournments, they held their final meeting on the 20th of April : and on the April 20th. 12th of May, the bill which Mr. Flood had May 12th.

again brought in, in purfuance of their common object, was again rejected.

During the course of the proceedings relative to parliamentary and conflicational reformation, intereils of a more prefing and important nature frequently divided the attention of the people, and were purfued with a more intemperate degree of zeal and violence. It foouid feem as if the manufacturers of Ireland had conceived an orinion, that the reflication of commercial freedom would operate like a charm, and diffuse in an instant that general profecrity over the nation, which could only be the effect of a long course of fragal, attentive, and perfevering industry. The fallacy of these sanguine expectations was foon apparent; and the evil, if not partly caufed, was greatly aggravated by the idlenefs of the lowest class of people, and that neglect of their proper occupations of the better fort, which was the confequence of the general disposition to political speculations,

Towards the end of the year 1783, the diffreffes of the manufacturers of Dublin had arifen to fuch a height, as for a flort time to fuperfede all laws, and to reduce the city to a flate of anarchy and confution; as a temporary remedy to this mifchief, fubicriptions were fet on foot for their relief, which were very liberally fupported, and in the mean time a committee was appointed by the Houfe of Commons to take into confideration the flate flate of the manufactures of the kingdom. Mr. Gardener, who took the lead in that bufinefs, paffed over into England, in order to confult with the king's minifters on the alarming exigence of affairs; but, as fhould appear from the event, without being able to agree with them on the adoption of any specific meafures.

On the 31st of March 1784, the houfe took into confideration the report of the committee; on which occafion Mr. Gardener brought forward a plan, for which the people had for fome time been extremely clamorous, namely, that of protecting duties-of protecting their own manufactures, and enforcing the confumption of them at home, by laying heavy duties on fimilar manufactures imported from other countries.

After flating the nature and ex. tent of the diffress under which the manufacturers laboured, Mr. Gardener adverted to the feveral modes which had been propofed of affording them relief. The first was to force the home confumption by non-importation agreements.-This was a measure which, he faid, was not very likely to receive the fanction of the legiflature, nor did he think it adviseable in itself; the expedient had been fully tried, as far as voluntary compacts could carry it, and had been attended with the most pernicious instead of beneficial effects; not to mention the outrageous exceffes into which the people had been led in the enforcing these agreements, it still left it in the power of the interested and avaricious to draw additional profits from the diffress of the country. The home manufactures were not only vended at the most extravagant price, but all incitement to emulation being removed, they had declined in their quality to the lowest extreme .- The second was, to encourage by bounties the export trade. But this, he thought, was beginning at the wrong end. Foreign trade could only be fecured by the excellence of the manufactures, and that, he contended, could only be obtained in the gradual progress of a home confumption. There then remained no other meafure than that he now propofed, by which a preference only would be given to the native manufacture, a preference which, he believed, in all other commercial countries, was uniformly fecured. He therefore concluded with moving, " That a " duty of two shillings and fix-" pence per yard be laid on all " drapery imported into that king-" dom." At the fame time he declared his intention of moving fcr proportionate duties on paper, manufactured iron, and a variety of other articles.

In answer to these arguments it was urged, that the protecting duty, if made effectual, would neceffarily produce all the confequences of nonimportation .- But what was chiefly infifted on was, that it could not be expected Great Britain would not retaliate, and that they might thereby run the rifk of lofing the linen trade, the value of which was a million and a half, for the uncertain profpect of encreasing the woolen, which did not exceed 50,000l. The queftion being at length put on Mr. Gardener's motion, it was rejected by a majority of 110 to 36

mob broke into the houfe of commons at the time of its fitting, reproached the members with having fold themfelves to Great Britain, and called on them at leaft to diffribute amongft the flarving manufacturers fome thare of the hire of their iniquity. The guards being fent for, put an end to the riot without any bloodfled, and two of the riugleaders were apprehended and committed to Newgate.

As there was great reafon to believe that the people were greatly incited to thefe violent excesses by the feditious and inflammatory libels which were daily circulated in the public papers, profecutions were commenced against several of the printers; and on the 7th of April a bill was brought in by Mr. Forfier, " for fecuring the liberty of the " prefs, by preventing the publica-" tion of libels." By this bill it was enacted, " That the real prin-** ter and proprietor of every news-* paper fhould make an affidavit of - his name and place of refidence, " and that the fame should be - lodged in the ftamp-office, to be " produced as fufficient evidence in " cases of profection for libels :---" That they should further enter " each into a recognizance of 500l. ** to answer all civil fuits that should * be inflituted against them in fuch " characters :- That they should " take no money for putting in or " having in any flanderous articles, " under a fevere penalty : and laft-" ly, that the hawker of any un-" famped inflammatory or libel-* lous paper should be compelled " to prove from whom he received " it, and fhould be fubjected to im-" prifonment ip/o facto by warrant " of any juffice of the peace." This bill was firenucufly opposed in both houfes of parliament, and feveral petitions were prefented against it. At length a fort of compromife took place. The most obnoxious clauses, those relative to the recognizance, and the imprisonment of hawkers, were withdrawn, and the bill, thus modified, passed with a pretty general concurrence.

Notwithstanding the vigorous conduct of the Irish government, the city of Dublin continued, during the whole courfe of the fummer 1785, to be a scene of tumult and diforder. No sooner was parliament rifen, than the expedient of non-importation agreements was again reforted to with greater zeal than ever.-Thefe engagements fpread themfelves into every quarter of the kingdom.-They received the fanction of feveral grand juries, and the merchants of the trading ports found themfelves compelled to fubfcribe to them. The enforcing of these prohibitory compacts naturally devolved upon the loweft clafs of the people, and they proceeded in the execution of this truft according to the most approved modes of popular difcipline. - To keep thefe exceffes . within fome bounds, the military were posted in such parts of the city as were the most subject to tumult, centinels were placed to prevent or to give notice of the first appearance of riot, and the garrifon was kept in conflant readine's for action.

This untemporifing difpolition in government, drew on the lord lieutenant, whole manners were in other respects peculiarly adapted to acquire the favour of that nation, an unufual fhare of popular odium, the effects of which he had frequently the mortification of experiencing.— In one inflance the public theatre was cholen to be the icene of manifefting fefting this ill-humour. He was received on his arrival in the houfe by the performance of a piece of mufic called the Volunteers March. A general uproar enfued; the entertainments of the evening were flopped; and it was faid that he narrowly efcaped undergoing one of those operations which are usually inflicted by the mob on perfons who have the misfortune to fall under their difpleafure. Irish parliament, in January 1785, the British cabinet, in concert with commissioners appointed on the part of Ireland, had formed a plan for regulating and finally adjusting the commercial intercourse between the two kingdoms.

On the 7th of February, Mr. Orde, the fecretary to the lord lieutenant, announced this fyflem to the house of commons, and on the 11th, a fet of resolutions*, which he had before laid on their table, were moved #### * Refolutions paffed by the Irish house of commons.

Refolved I. That it is the opinion of this committee, that it is highly important to the intereft of the British empire, that the trade between Great Britain and Ireland be extended as much as possible, and for that purpose that the intercourse and commerce be finally settled and regulated on permanent and equitable principles, for the mutual benefit of both countries.

Refolved II. That towards carrying into full effect fo defirable a fettlement, it is fit and proper that all articles, not the growth of Great Britain and Ireland, fhould be imported into each kingdom from the other, under the fame regulations, and at the fame duties, if fubject to duties, to which they are liable when imported directly from the place of their growth, product, or manufacture; and that all duties originally paid on importation, to either country refpectively, fhall be drawn back on exportation to the other.

drawn back on exportation to the other. Refolved III. That for the fame purpofe, that it is proper that no prohibition fhould exist in either country against the importation, use, or fale of any article, the growth, product, or manufacture of the other; and that the duty on the importation of every fuch article, if fubject to duty in either country, fhould be precifely the fame in one country as in the other, except where an addition may be neceffary in either country, in confequence of an internal duty on any fuch article of its own confumption.

Refolved IV. That in all cafes where the duties on articles of the growth, product, or manufacture of either country are different on the importation into the other, it would be expedient that they fhould be reduced, in the kingdom where they are the higheft, to the amount payable in the other, and that all fuch articles fhould be exportable from the kingdom into which they fhall be imported, as free from duty as the fimilar commodities or home manufactures of the fame kingdom.

 $\hat{R}e[olved V]$ . That for the fame purpole, it is also proper that in all cafes where either kingdom fhall charge articles of its own confumption with an internal duty on the manufacture, or a duty on the material, the fame manufacture, when imported from the other, may be charged with a further duty on importation, to the fame amount as the internal duty on the manufacture, or to an amount adequate to countervail the duty on the material, and thall be entitled to fuch drawbacks or bounties on exportation, as may leave the fame fubject to no heavier burthen than the home-made manufacture; fuch further duty to continue to long only as the internal confiningtion final be charged with the duty or duties, to balance which it finally. and agreed to by the houfe without much difcuffion, and without any material alterations. The concurrence of the houfe of peers being foon after obtained, these resolutions were immediately transmitted to England, as the proposed basis, on the part of that country, for an equitable and final adjustment.

Almost immediately after their arrival, the bufinefs was opened before a committee of the house of commons by Mr. Pitt, who concluded a fpeech of confiderable length with moving the following general refolation : " That it was highly impor-" tant to the general interests of the " empire, that the commercial in-" tercourfe between Great Britain " and Ireland fhould be finally ad-" jufted, and that Ireland fhould be " permitted to a permanent and " irrevocable participation of the " commercial advantages of this

- " country, when her parliament
- " fhould permanently and irrevocashall be imposed, or until the manufacture coming from the other kingdom shall be fubjected there to an equal burthen, not drawn back or compensated on exportation.

Rejelved VI. That in order to give permanency to the fettlements now intended to be established, it is necessary that no prohibition, or new or additional duties, fhould be hereafter imposed in either kingdom, on the importation of any article of the growth, product, or manufacture of the other, except fuch additional duties as may be requifite to balance duties on internal confumption, purfuant to the foregoing refolution.

Refolved VII. That for the fame purpole, it is neceffary further that no prohibitions, or new additional duties, fliould be hercafter imposed on either kingdoms, on the exportation of any article of native growth, product, or manufacture, from' thence to the other, except such as either kingdom more dealed any digat from time to time, upon corn, meal, malt, flour, and blouit; and alfo, except where there now exifts any prohibition, which is not reciprocal, or any duty, which is not equal, in both kingdoms; in every which cafe the prohibition may be made reciprocal, or the duties raifed fo as to make them equal.

Refolved VIII. That for the fame purpofe, it is necessary that no bounties whatfoever flould be paid or payable in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article to the other, except fuch as relate to corn, meal, malt, flour, and bifcuits, and fuch as are in the nature of drawbacks or compensations for duties paid; and that no bounties fhould be granted in this kingdom, on the exportation of any article imported from the Bruith plantations, or any manufacture made of fuch article, unlefs in cales where a limitar bounty is payable in Britain on exportation from thence, or where fuch bounty is merely in the nature of a drawback, or compensation of or for duties paid over and above any duties paid thereon in Britain.

Rejolved IX. That it is expedient for the general benefit of the British empire, that the importation of articles from foreign ftates foould be regulated from time to time, in each kingdom, on fuch terms as may afford an effectual preference to the importation of fimilar articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other.

Refolved X. That for the better protection of trade, whatever fum the grofs hereditary revenue of this kingdom (aiter deducting all drawbacks, re-payments, or bounties granted in the nature of drawbacks) shall produce annually, over and fhould be appropriated towards the fupport of the above the fum of f. naval force of the empire, in fuch manner as the parliament of this kingdom shall direct.

" bly fecure an aid out of the fur-" plus of the hereditary revenue of " that kingdom, towards defraying " the expence of protecting the ge-" neral commerce of the empire in " time of peace."

Mr. Pitt, after taking a review of what had already been granted to Ireland by the British parliament, obferved, That the concessions now proposed to be made to that kingdom, in order to put the two countries on a fair and equal footing, he should reduce to two heads:

First, The importation of the produce of our colouies in the West Indies and America through Ireland into Great Britain.

Second, A mutual exchange between the two countries of their refpective productions and manufactures, upon equal terms.

With regard to the firft, he allowed it had the appearance of militating againft the nawigation laws, for which England had ever had the greateft partiality. But as fhe had already allowed Ireland to trade immediately and directly with the colonies, he could not fee how the importing of the produce of thole colonies circuitoufly through Ireland into Great Britain could injure the colonial trade of this country, which was a direct one, and therefore to be made at a lefs expence and rifque, than that which was circuitous.

In return for these concessions on the part of Great Britain, he proposed that Ireland should agree to the payment of a certain sipulated fum yearly out of the surplus of her hereditary revenue, towards defraying the general expenses of the empire.

Such was the general outline of the proposed fystem on its first anpearance. In the outfet, both those within and those without doors feemed to comprehend but little, and to be full leis concerned about an objest of fuch extent and importance. A fortnight elapfed before the fubject again made its appearance; during which interim a report, prepared by a committee of the board of trade and plantations, was laid by the minister upon the table of the house of commons, to affilt its deliberations. This report was stated to be founded upon the declarations and opinions of fome of the principal manufacturers and merchants in the kingdom, who had been examined by the above-mentioned committee; and its particular object was to prove the expediency of that part of the fystem which related to reducing the duties payable upon the importation of Irish produce and manufactures into Great Britain, to avhat the fame fort of articles were charged with in this country *.

In the mean time the merchants and manufacturers who had been examined before the committee. joined by great numbers of others from every part of the nation, met together for the purpole of taking the Irith propositions into their confideration .- During the courfe of their proceedings it appeared, that the opinions of the former were in direct contradiction to the inferences which had been drawn from their examination in the report laid before parliament. Whether this was occafioned by any change which, upon a fuller confideration, had taken place in the minds of the merchants and manufacturers themfelves, or whether the committee of the board of trade and plantations had itrained and perverted their declarations, it is not eafy to determine. However, the confequence was, that it threw a confiderable degree of difcredit upon the report itfelf, and feemed to point out the necessity there was for the house of commons to examine the different commercial and manufacturing bodies concerned, at their own bar. This mode of proceeding gave the first check to the fystem in its progress through the houfe, whilft without doors it became more unpopular, in proportion as it became more thoroughly invefligated.

March and April 1785. During the months of March and April, and until the middle of May, the house was occupied in receiving the petitions, and hearing the evidence of manufacturers and merchants of every defcription.

This laborious and minute mode of inveffigation being gone through, the propolitions were again brought May 12th, forward by Mr. Pitt, on 1785. with avariety of amendments, variations, and additions... To the original fet of propofitions, ten new ones were added, fome of them only fupplemental to, and explanatory of the former, but feveral containing much new and important matter; we fhall therefore lay them as they now flood, at large before our readers, in the note below *.

The chief objects of the additional propositions were to provide, 1ft, That whatever navigation laws the British parliament should hereafter find it necessary to enact for the prefervation of her marine, the fame

* I. That it is highly important to the intercfts of both countries, that the commerce between Great Britain and Ireland fhould be finally regulated on permanent and equitable principles, for the mutual benefit of both countries.

II. That a full participation of commercial advantages fhould be permanently fecured to Ireland, whenever a provision, equally permanent and fecure, fhall be made by the parliament of that kingdom towards defraying, in proportion to its growing profperity, the neceffary expenses in time of peace, of protecting the trade and general interefts of the empire.

III. That towards carrying into full effect to defirable a fettlement, it is fit and proper that all articles, not the growth or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, "except thole of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of any of the "countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to the Streights of Magellan," hould be imported into each kingdom from the other reciprocally, under the fame regulations, and at the fame duties (if fubject to duties) to which they "would "be" liable when imported directly from the "country or place from whence "the fame may have been imported into Great Britain or Ireland refpectively, as "the cafe may be;" and that all duties originally paid on importation into either country refpectively, except on arrack and foreign brandy, and on rum, and all forts of floring waters not imported from the British colonies in the Weft Indies, thall be fully drawn back on exportation to the other. "But, neverthelefs, that "the duties fhall continue to be protected and guarded, as at prefent, by with "holding the drawback, until a certificate from the proper officers of the revenue, "in the kingdom to which the export may be made, fhall be returned and com-" pared with the entry outwards."

fame fhould be paffed by the legiflature of Ireland. zdly, Against the importing into Ireland, and from thence into Great Britain, of any other Weft India merchandizes than fuch as were the produce of our own colonies ;—and 3dly, That Ireland fhould debar itfelf from trading to any

IV. That it is highly important to the general interefts of the British empire, that the laws for regulating trade and navigation should be the fame in Great Britain and Ireland; and, therefore, that it is effential, towards carrying into effect the prefent fettlement, that all laws which have been made, or shall be made in Great Britain, for fecuring exclusive privileges to the ships and maximers of Great Britain, for fecuring exclusive privileges to the ships and maximers of Great Britain the trade of the British colonies and plantations, and for regulating and reftraining the trade of the British colonies and plantations, "fuch laws "imposing the fame reftraints, and conferring the fame benefits on the subjects of "both kingdoms, should" be in force in Ireland, "by laws to be passed by the "great Britain.

V. That it is farther effential to this fettlement, that all goods and commodities of the growth, produce, or manufacture of British or foreign colonies in America, or the West Indies; and the British or foreign fettlements on the coast of Africa, imported into Ireland, should, on importation, be tubject to the fame duties " and regulations" as the like goods are, or from time to time shall be fubject to, upon importation into Great Britain; " or if prohibited from being " imported into Ireland, shall in like manner be prohibited from being im-" ported into Ireland."

VI. That in order to prevent illicit practices, injurious to the revenue and commerce of both kingdoms, it is expedient that all goods, whether of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain or Ireland, or of any foreign country, which shall hereafter be imported into Great Britain from Ireland, or into Ireland from Great Britain, should be put, by laws to be patted in the parliament of the two kingdoms, under the fame regulations with respect to bonds, cockets, and other instruments, to which the like goods are now subject in passing from one port of Great Britain to another.

VII. That for the like purpofe, it is also expedient that when any goods, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the British Weft India Islands, "or any "other of the British colonies or plantations," fall be fhipped from Ireland for Great Britain, they flould be accompanied with fuch original certificates of the revenue officers of the faid colonies as shall be required by the law on importation into Great Britain ; and that when the whole quantity included in one certificate thall not be shipped at any one time, the original certificate, properly indorsed as to quantity, should be fent with the first parcel; and to identify the remainder, if shipped at any future period, new certificates should be granted by the principal officers of the ports in Ireland, extracted from a register of the original documents, she ports.

VIII. That it is effential for carrying into effect the prefent fettlement, that all goods exported from Ireland to the British colonies in the Weft Indics, or in America, "or to the British fettlements on the coast of Africa," should from time to time be made liable to fuch duties and drawbacks, and put under such regulations as may be necessary, in order that the fame may not be exported with lefs incumbrance of duties or imposition than the like goods shall be burdened with when exported from Great British.

In the courfe of the debates upon the propositions as they flood with thefe

" that fo long as the parliament of this kingdom fhall think it adviseable that the " commerce to the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope shall be carried on folely " by an exclusive company, having liberty to import into the port of London only, " no goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any countries beyond the Cape " of Good Hope should be importable into Ireland from any foreign country, or " from any fet lement in the East Indies belonging to any fuch foreign country; and " that no goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the faid countries should " be allowed to be imported into Ireland but through Great Britain; and it shall " he lawful to export fuch goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Streights of Magellan " from Great Britain to Ireland, with the fame duties retained thereon as are now " retained on their being exported to that kingdom; but that an account fhall be " kept of the duties retained, and the net drawback on the fuid goods imported to " Ireland; and that the amount thereof shall be remitted by the receiver-general " of his majefty's cuttoms in Great Britain to the proper officer of the revenue in " Ireland, to be placed to the account of his majefty's revenue there, fubject to " the difpofal of the parliament of that kingdom; and that whenever the com-" merce to the faid countries shall cease to be carried on by an exclusive company " in the goods of the produce of countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the « Streights of Magellan, the goods fhould be importable into Ireland from coun-" tries from which they may be importable to Great Britain, and no other; and " that no veffel fhould be cleared out from Ireland for any part of the countries " from the Cape of Good Hope to the Streights of Magellan, but fuch as shall " be freighted in Ireland by the faid exclusive company, and shall have failed from " the port of London; and that the fhips going from Great Britain to any of " the faid countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope should not be restrained from " touching at any of the posts in Ireland, and taking on board there any of the " goods of the growth, produce, or manufacture of that kingdom." X. That no prohibition should exist, in either country, against the importation,

X. That no prohibition fhould exift, in either country, against the importation, ufe, or fale of any article, the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other; except fuch as either kingdom my judge expedient, from time to time, upon corn, meal, malt, flour, and bifcuits; " and except fuch qualified prohibitions, " at prefent contained in any act of the Britifh or Irifh parliament, as do not ab-" folutely prevent the importation of goods or manufactures, or materials of ma-" nufactures, but only regulate the weight, the faze, the packages, or other par-" ticular circumfances, or preferibe the built or country, and dimenfions of the " fhips importing the fame; and alfo, except on animunition, arms, gunpowder, " and ther utenfils of war, importable culy y virtue of his majelty's licence;" and that the detv on the importation of every fuch article (if fabiect to duty in either country) should be precified, the fame in the one country as in the other, except where an addition may be noteffary in either country, in confequence of an internal duty on any fuch article of its own confumption, yor in confequence of an " internal bounties in the country where fuch art cle is grown, produced, or ma-" nufactured, and except fuch duties as either hingdom may judge expedient, " from time to time, upon conn meal, malt, flour, and bifcuits."

XI. That in all cafes where the duties on articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of either country, are different on the importation into the other, it is thefe amendments and additions, that which met with the molt vigorous opposition (independent of fuch general reasoning as went against the fystem altogether) was the fourth, in which Great Britain, it was afferted, affumed both a prefent and future power to bind Ireland by fuch acts is expedient that they fhould be reduced, in the kingdom where they are the highth, to " an amount not exceeding" the amount poyable in the other; " fo that " the fame fhall not be lefs than ten and a half per cent, where any article was " charged with a duty, on importation into Ireland, of ten and a half per cent. " or upwards, previous to the 17th day of May, 1782;" and that all fuch articles fhould be exportable, from the kingdom into which they fhall be imported, as free from duty as the fimilar commodities or home manufactures of the fame kingdom.

XII. That it is also proper, that in all cafes where the articles of the confumption of either kingdom fhall be charged with an internal duty on the manufacture, the faid manufacture, when imported from the other, may be charged with a farther duty on importation, adequate to countervail the internal duty on the manufacture "as far as relates to the dutics now charged thereon ;" fuch farther duty to continue to long only as the internal confinantion fhall be charged with the duty or duties to balance which it fhall be imposed; and that where there is a duty on the importation of the raw material of any manufacture in one kingdom, greater than the like duty on raw materials in the other, fuch manufacture may, on its importation " into the other kingdom," be charged with fuch a countervailing duty as may be fufficient to fubject the fame, fo imported, to " burdens " adequate to those which " the manufacture composed of the like raw material is fubject to, in confequence of duties on the importation of fuch material in the kingdom into which fuch manufacture is fo imported; and the faid manufacture, fo imported, shall be entitled to fuch drawbacks or bounties on exportation, as may leave the fame subject to no heavier burden than the home-made manufacture.

XIII. That, in order to give permanency to the fettlement now intended to be eftablished, it is neceffary that no new or additional duties should be hereafter impoled, in either kingdom, on the importation of any article of the growth, produce, or manufacture of the other; except fuch additional duties as may be requifite to balance the duties on internal confumption, purfuant to the foregoing refourion, " or in confequence of bounties remaining on fuch articles when ex-" ported from the other kingdo.n."

XIV. That for the fame purpose, it is neceffary, further, that no prohibition, or new or additional duties, shall be hereafter imposed in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article of native growth, produce, or manufacture, from "the "one kingdom" to the other, except fuch as either kingdom may deen expedient, from time to time, upon corn, meal, malt, flour, and bifcuits.

XV. That for the fame purpole, it is neceffary that no bounties whatfoever fhould be paid or payable in either kingdom, on the exportation of any article to the other, except fuch as rolate to corn, meal, malt, flour; and bifcuits, " and ex-" cept allo the bounties at prefent given by Great Britain on" beer, and fpirits diffilled from corn; and fuch as are in the nature of drawbacks or compenfations for duties paid; and that no bounty fhould be " payable" on the exportation of any article to any Britifh colonies or plantations, " or to the Britifh fettlements on " the coaft of Africa," or on the exportation of any article imported from the Britifh fettlements in the Eaft Indies;" or any manufacture made of fuch arti-

acts as fhe fhould pafs relative to the trade and commerce of both kingdoms. This was ftated to be directly in the teeth of what had been folemnly flipulated betwixt the two kingdoms, namely, that Ireland was in future only to be bound by her own flatutes—That it was a refomption of the right of legislating for Ireland, which this country had renounced—That it was bartering the liberties of Ireland for the advantages held out to that kingdom by the fystem now proposed, and there-cle, unlefs in cafes where a fimilar bounty is payable in Great Britain, on exportation from thence, or where fuch bounty is merely in the nature of a drawback or compenfation of or for duties paid, over and above any duties paid thereon in Britaiu; and where "any internal bounty fhall be given in either kingdom, on any "goods manufactured therein, and fhall remain on fuch goods when exported, a "countervailing duty adequate thereto may be laid upon the importation of the faid goods into the other kingdom."

XVI. That it is expedient for the general benefit of the British empire, that the importation of articles from foreign " countries" should be regulated from time to time in each kingdom on such terms as may " effectually favour" the importation of similar articles of the growth, product, or manufacture of the other; " except " in the cafe of materials of manufactures, which are, or hereafter may be al-" lowed to be imported from foreign countries, duty-free; and that in all cafes " where any articles are or may be fubject to higher duties on importation into " this kingdom, from the countries belonging to any of the flates of North Ame-" rica, than the like goods are or may be fubject to when imported, as the growth, " produce, or manufacture of the British colonies and plantations; or as the pro-" duce of the fisheries carried on by British fubjects, fuch articles shall be fubject " to the fame duties on importation into Ireland, from the countries belonging to any of the flates of North America, as the fame are or may be fubject to on im-" protation from the faid countries into this kingdom."

"XVII. That it is expedient that measures should be taken to prevent disputes touching the exercise of the right of the inhabitants of each kingdom to fish on the coast of any part of the British dominions."

XVIII. That it is expedient that "fuch privileges of printing and vending "books as are or may be legally poliefied within Great Britain, under the grant of "the crown or otherwife, and" the copy-rights of the authors and bookfellers of Great Britain, fhould continue to be protected in the manner they are at prefent, by the laws of Great Britain; and that it is just that measures fhould be taken by the parliament of Ireland for giving the like protection to the copy-rights of the authors and bookfellers of that kingdom.

XIX. "That it is expedient that regulations should be adopted with refpect to " patents to be hereafter granted for the encouragement of new inventions, so that " the rights, privileges, and reftrictions thereon granted and contained, shall be of " equal duration and force throughout Great Britain and Ireland."

XX. That the appropriation of whatever fum the groß hereditary revenue of the kingdom of Ireland (the due collection thereof being fecured by permanent provifions) fhall produce, after deducting all drawbacks, re-payments, or bounties granted in the nature of drawbacks, over and above the fum of fix hundred and fifty-fix thoufand pounds in each year, towards the fupport of the naval force of the empire, to be applied in fuch mauner as the parliament of Ireland fhall direct, by an act to be pailed for that purpofe, will be a fatisfactory provision, proportioned to the growing profperity of that kingdom, towards defraying, in time of peace, the necellary expences of protecting the trade and general interefts of the empire.

by purchasing Irish slavery at the expence of English commerce.

With respect to the last proposition, which flipulated, that whenever there should be a surplus of the revenue of Ireland, over and above the fum of 656,000 l. fuch furplus fhould be applied to the fupport of the British navy, it was urged, that if this was held forth as a compenfation for advantages voluntarily refigned by Great Britain, nothing could be more fallacious, the prefent net revenue of that kingdom being little more than 333,000l. and therefore little more than half the ftipulated fum, over and above which the furplus only was to be applied in aid of the public revenue of this country.

The arguments which were offered generally, and against the whole of the proposed fystem, went chiefly upon the supposed injury which the manufactures and commerce of Great Britain would suftain from it: the former, from the comparative small price of labour in Ireland, which alone, it was contended, would soon enable that kingdom to undersell us both at home and abroad; the latter, from the facility with which it was well known the revenue laws in Ireland were evaded.

The impoffibility of preventing the clandeltine importation of a variety of the most important articles, was strongly infisted on; and it was added, that the competition which would arife betwixt the two kingdoms, which should fell cheapest, would of course encrease the evil.

Finally, it was argued, that fuch was the nature of the propositions, that in whatever proportion one country might benefit from them, in the very fame the other would become a lofer; and that as to Ireland, whether the advantages gained on her part were great or fmall, they were to be purchased at the price of her liberty.

In favour of the fystem it was argued, that it was a measure of abfolute neceffity, in order to put an end to the discontents which prevailed to so alarming a degree in the fister kingdom.—That if the present propositions were not passed into a law, all that had already been done in favour of Ireland would prove nugatory, as it was clearly inadequate to the expectations of that country.

That with respect to the fourth proposition, it was a condition which the fafety of our own navigation laws made it neceffary to annex to the boon granted to Ireland.-T hat it was unfair to infer from hence that the British legislature had any views of trenching on the independence of Ireland, fince it left to that kingdom the option of taking or refusing the advantages held out to her, fubject to fuch a condition. That the condition itfelf was fuch as had frequently been adopted in the negotiations of independent states-as in the late treaty betwixt this kingdom and France, when the latter bound herfelf to publish certain edicts, as soon as other edicts stipulated on our part were published by this country *.

With refpect to the difadvantages which it had been fuppofed our manufacturers would have to encounter from the comparative finall price of labour in Ireland, it was faid tuch a supposition arole from a misconception of facts-That the wages of artizans and manufacturers, although not of common labourers, were higher there than in this country, and therefore there was little like-Jihoo 1 of their being able to underfell us on that ground.--Nor could our commerce be in any danger from the reafons which had been alledged, fince the provisions and reftrictions contained in the propositions were fufficient as well to prevent any clandeftine importation of foreign goods into Ireland, as to infure the duties payable on all fuch as might be legally imported.

The propositions, after having been agitated upwards of three months, and after having received a variety of amendments and alterations, finally passed the house of commons by a large majority, and May 30th. were carried up to the house of lords. They here again encountered a confiderable degree of opposition, and received feveral amendments, although not of a material nature.

The propositions having thus paffed both houses, a bill founded on them was brought into the house of commons by Mr. Pitt, which was read the first time before the end of July 28th. the fession, and was followed by an address to his majesty, voted by both houses, wherein they acquainted him with what they had done, and that it remained for the parliament of Ireland to judge and to decide thereupon.

That kingdom had attended the progrefs of the propotitions through the Britifh parliament with much anxiety and impatience. On their arrival they met with the most difcouraging reception; they were petitioned against by feveral of the public bodies, and many of the members of the Irifh house of commons firongly marked their difapprobation of the additions and alterations which the original fystem had undergone.

On the 12th of Au-Aug. 12th, guft, the fecretary to the lord lieutenant moved the house for leave to bring in a bill correspondent to that moved by the English minister .- The debates on this occafion, and more efpecially on the fide of oppofition, were long and animated. Whatever had the leaft appearance of infringing on the legiflative independency of Ireland, was marked and fligmatized in terms of the utmoft indignation and contempt. The perpetual disposition of her hereditary revenue by the laft proposition-the furrender of her commercial legislation by the fourth-the reftraint imposed on her from trading beyond the Cape of Good Hope and the Streights of Magellan by the ninth-were put in every point of view in which reafoning and eloquence could render them imprefive and convincing. On this fide of the queftion, Mr. Grattan and Mr. Flood were the most confpicuous speakers. The first of these gentlemen, after flating the present situation of Ireland, with respect to the advantages she had already acquired, compared it with the condition it would be left in by the fystem now proposed. " See," faid he, " what you obtained without compensation-a colony trade, a free trade, the independency of your judges, the government of your army, the extenfion of the conflitutional powers of your council, the reftoration of the judicature of your lords, and the independency of your legiliature!

" See now what you obtain by compensation-a covenant not to trade beyond the Cape of Good Hope and the Streights of Magellana covenant not to take foreign plantation produce, but as the parliament of Great Britain shall permit-a covenant not to take British plantation produce, but as Great Britain fhall prefcribe-a covenant not to take certain produce of the United States of North America, but as Great Britain shall permit-a covenant to make fuch acts of navigation as Great Britain shall prefcribe-a covenant never to protect your own manufactures, never to guard the primum of those manufactures !"

In favour of the bill it was urged by Mr. Fitzgibbon*, Mr. Hutchinfon †, and Mr. Forfter §, that the fourth propofition, which had excited fo much jealoufy and alarm, could not on any fair conftruction befaid to take from Ireland her right of commercial legislation, any more than the acts passed in 1779 and 1782 had done before; wherein Ireland had stipulated to trade with the British colonies and fettlements in fuch manner as Great Britain herfelf traded, to impose the like duties, and to adopt the fame reffrictions and regulations. That in the bill before them, it was proposed to trade with Great Britain on the fame principle; the liberty of either complying with the conditions, or renouncing the agreement in toto, whenever the conditions should become obnoxious and diffatisfactory, would be left by the present bill full as much in the power of the Irifn parliament, as it was by either of the foregoing acts -The difference only was, that by the former acts Ireland had fubfcribed to the commercial laws which had been adopted by Great Britain for 290 years back; by the prefent, to fuch as that country should bind itfelf to in fature; but that it would be full in the power of the Irifn parliament to renounce thefe laws, and the whole agreement together, whenever she thought proper .- On the other hand, the commercial advantages offered to Ireland by the bill were stated to be very important ; the linen trade was thereby fecured to her for ever -the colony trade through Ireland to Great Britain was given herthe British markets were thrown open to Irith manufactures-and again, as these manufactures were allowed to be re-exported from Great Britain, with a drawback of all duties, the Irifh would, in effect, export on the foundation of British capital, at the fame time that they were left to employ their own capital in the extension of their home manufactures.

The

The houfe at length divided upon the question; when there appeared for leave to bring in the bill, 127, against it, 108.

So fmall a majority in favour of fo important a meafure, was looked upon as a defeat; and accordingly, although Mr. Orde afterwards moved to have the bill read a firft time, and to be printed, yet he declared he fhould not proceed any further in the bufinefs during the prefent feffion, nor at all, unleis the kingdom in general fhould grow to a better liking of a meafure, which he was confident, upon a further and more temperate re-confideration of its principles, would obtain their approbation.

Thus terminated the intended commercial arrangement betwixt Great Britain and Ireland, after having exercised the attention of both kingdoms for upwards of seven months.

We shall take this opportunity, before we dismiss our review of Irish affairs, to mention the intended settlement of the Genevese emigrants in Ireland.

The difputes and diffensions which had so long subsisted betwixt the ariflocratic and democratic powers in the republic of Geneva being finally terminated in favour of the former, through the interference of the kings of France and Sardinia, and the cantons of Zuric and Berne, a number of the citizens of the popular party refolved to quit a country, in the government of which their weight and authority was totally at an end.

On this occasion they turned their eyes upon Ireland, and commissioners were accordingly fent by them to Dublin, to confult and treat with government there relative to their reception into that kingdom. The commiffioners, on their arrival, received the greateft perfonal attention from the people in general, but more efpecially from the different corps of volunteers in the province of Leinster, into feveral of which, as a mark of refpect paid to the caufe they came to folicit, they were chosen as members.

Their request, with respect to the admission of their countrymen into Ireland, was complied with, and a particular tract of land in the county of Waterford was afterwards fet apart for the new fettlers.

Notwithstanding these preparations, the whole scheme in the end proved abortive. The terms infifted upon by the Genevefe, previous to their becoming fubjects of a new ftate were, 1ft. That they fhould be reprefented in parliament. 2dly. That they fhould be formed into a diffinct corporation. And, 3dly. That they should be governed by their own laws. The first of these conditions might have been a matter of opinion, and fubject to difcuffion ; but the two last were held to be incompatible with the laws and the conftitution of Ireland, and as fuch were totally rejected.

This difagreement between the parties on leading points flopped all further procedure in the bufinefs. Some of the Genevefe, however, transported themfelves into Ireland; but they foon found by experience, that nothing was gained by changing their fituation, and most of them, after a fhort flay, quitted the kingdom.

The reciprocal advantages which might have accrued to Ireland and the Genevefe emigrants from the. propofed fettlement, even had it taken taken place to the fulleft extent, could never, it is prefumed, have equalled, or been in any degree proportionable to the fanguine expectations fome men had been led to form on this fubject. It fhould be confidered, firft, that the Genevefe are for the moft part mechanics, and that therefore they muft have been but ill fuited, from their former habits of life, to the toils of agriculture; next, that they were to be fettled in a part of Ireland where their fupport muft have arifen from their daily labours on the foil, and from their having but few wants of their own to gratify, more than from their ingenuity in forming and conflucting a variety of ornamental articles, which the luxury and riches of populous and trading towns can only create a market for.

Regulation in Florence for the disposal of the dead in a common concervy, causes great discontent.

THE fruitfulnels of the queen of France, which had for feveral years been a matter of much doubt and great anxiety to the king and the people, though at length eflablished by the birth of a princess in 1778, yet the failure of a fon ftill continued to excite impatience and apprehention, until all uneafinels upon the fubject was at length determined by the oirth of a dauphin on the 22d of October 1781, to the inexpreflible joy of a nation, who, through a long feries of ages, have been more peculiarl, attached to their monarchs than perhaps any other on the face of the earth. lt was a new and unexpected fpettacle to mankind upon this occasion, and one among the many grievous mortiscations which Great Britain was about that period doomod to endure, that the birth of a dauphin of France should have eccasioned the greatest public rejoicings that had ever been known in the Englifh American colonies.

The queen, in the year 1785, produced another pledge of fecurity to the reigning line in France, by the birth of a fecond fon, in whole favour the old Norman and English title of duke of Normandy was, for the first time, revived in a French prince.

The celebrated count de Maurepas died at the cafile of Verfailles in the month of November 1781, and in the Stift year or his ago; helding, at that very advanced p(z, z) of life, in a reafon of great national exertion, and or a very perilous and hard-fought foreign war, which extended its action to every quarter of the world, the great and arduous office of prime minifter of France. This great man was not more admired for his abilities as a minifter, and talents as a flatefman, than he was revered and beloved for his humanity, benevolence, and other excellent qualities of the heart.

When, under the aufpices of cardinal Fleury, and in his own happier days, his great and numerous offices feemed to render him at least the third, if not the fecond in administration, he was one of the few minifiers who introduced fcience and philosophy into the conduct of public affairs; but was at the fame time fo regulated in their indulgence, as entirely to reject their useless or frivolous parts, however fplendid or pleasing; as if he difdained to apply the public money to any other purpofes than those folid ones of public utility. Though confiderably cramped in many of his public defigns and exertions under the pacific and œconomical fyftem of the cardinal, yet he not only in a great meafure recovered the French marine from that proftrate flate to which it had long feemed inclusivably condemned, but he laid the foundations for all that greatness to which it has fince arrived, or which it is fill capable of attaining. To him France is our icularly indebted for that fuperiority, which the is faid (and it is to be feared too evidently) to ppffeis fefs in fhip-building; efpecially in the construction of ships of war: for he it was who first refcued naval architecture from mere mechanical hands, from the habitual and unexamined prejudices of vulgar error; and placing it in the rank which it deferved to hold, it foon rofe, under his influence and protection, to be confidered as a diffinct and profound fcience; and was accordingly fludied and reduced to practice upon those principles by men of the first parts and learning. Such eminent and permanent national fervices, which in time diffuse themselves into common benefits to mankind, are frequently little thought of at the moment, and the ingenious author or inventor is foon forgotten; while he who applies his genius or invention, with a vain-glorious fplendour, to the deftruction of his fellow-creatures, although not even the partial benefits of his fuccefs may furvive the year in which it takes place, shall have his name handed down with applaufe and admiration to futurity. Is there then a perverfeneis inherent in mankind which difpofes them, as it were, to worship the evil principle, to defpife their real benefactors, and to adore those who, by becoming the confpicuous instruments of transitory refentments, do in fact make war upon the permanent interests of the race itself? May it not then be the office of history, going hand in hand with philosophy, to draw away the eyes of mankind from the glaring objects which dazzle and confound them, and to teach them to relt on more fober and beneficial lights; to calculate and correct the error of popular opinion, and, by rating actions according to their intrinfic value, as it were, to graduate anew the fcale of admiration?

Although cardinal Fleury poffeffed at the time the oftenüble praife, it was to Maurepas only that fcience is indebted for that grand defign and arduous undertaking of alcertaining the real figure of the earth, by fending the French academicians and aftronomers to measure degrees of the meridian under the equator, and in the northern polar circle. The unexpected difficulties which they experienced, and the extraordinary hardfhips and difficulties they encountered, are too well known to be repeated.

When the cabals of the court had, in the year 174S, banifhed Maurepas far from its vortex (an evil of all others the most intolerable to a Frenchman) he exhibited an inflance, almost fingular in that country, of bearing his fall from a fituation of greatness, in which he had been nurtured from his earliest youth, with the dignity of a man, and the temper of a philosopher. He adorned his long exile, as he had done his posses of beneficence, and the practice of every private virtue.

When at length, in the 74th year of his age, the long-forgotten flatefman was most honourably recalled to court, in order to become the mentor and guide of his young fovereign in the yet untrodden paths of government, neither this fudden and unexpected exaltation, nor his long absence from the world, produced any change in the temper and character of Maurepas. In the changes which necessarily took place at court, and in the administration, none of the difmified minifiers were (according to the eftablished eriquette ) 28] quette) fent into exile, nor did they fuffer any other degradation or inconvenience, than what proceeded merely from the loss of their places; no mean jealousy appeared, no act of feverity or refentment took place, no ancient animofity was revived, nor prefent hatred gratified, to fully the luftre of his triumph on returning to power. A fimilar magnanimity feemed to be the principle of the enfuing administration. He had the courage to burft at once through those narrow political fetters, which, originating partly in pride, and partly in bigotry, were now fo riveted by time, as to be confidered and received as fundamental max-The pride of ims of government. the nobility confined the great offices of state to their own families; and the profession of the law, whole credit in France is great, and perhaps excessive, had in a manner appropriated to itfelf the financial department; while both leaned hard upon the commercial interest, national and religious prejudices cooperated in the exclusion of foreigners, and of all those of a different perfuation in religious matters, however eminent their abilities, from rendering any fervice to the flate. Maurepas induced his young fovereign, in a fingle inftance, to fet at naught thefe maxims, and to violate all these prejudices, by calling in to be his assistant, as director-general of the finances, M. Necker, a merchant, a foreigner, and a protestant. -Such was Maurepas!

In the year 1784, a new convention was entered into between France and Sweden, tending to ftreighten fill more clofely the bands of union which have fo long fubfifted between the two nations, and which have been maintained with fo much advantage, and at fo fmall an expence, by the former. In virtue of this new convention, the French are admitted to the rights and privileges of natives in the city and port of Gottenburgh, (which, from the goodnefs of the harbour, its fituation without the Sound, and other advantages, may be justly confidered as the emporium for the foreign trade of Sweden) being permitted to build and eftablish warehouses for the storing of all manner of goods imported either from France or America, in the bottoms of either nation, without their being fubject to any duties or impositions whatever; with the farther liberty to the merchants or proprietors to export all fuch goods at pleafure, either in French or Swedish bottoms, and upon the fame free terms. In return for the advantages expected from these favourable stipulations, France has ceded to Sweden, in perpetuity, the full propriety and fovereignty of the island of St. Bartholomew in the Weft Indies .- The king of Sweden, in order to convert this island to the best account, of which it is capable, has fince declared it a free port.

Nothing lefs than the prefent enthusiasm in favour of commerce, which is fo ftrong in every part of Europe, could render fo trifling and fo remote a pofferfion in any degree acceptable. The island in question is effimated only at about five leagues in circumference; the quantity of its cultivable foil bears a very fmall proportion even to that extent; in water it is fo deficient, as to have none but what falls from the clouds, and is preferved through the year in cifterns; and though it has a good harbour, the adjoining coaffs are fo dangerous, and the approaches to to it fo difficult, as to forbid its ever becoming of commercial importance. With fuch defects, the intrinfic value of the ifland of St. Bartholomew cannot be very highly rated.

On the other hand, it feems to be an odd fort of policy, for any of the three powers who are poffeffed of the principal Weft India islands to draw in new states to interfere in that commerce of which they are fo extremely jealous; and it feems still more unaccountable to make donations of fmall unproductive islands or rocks, which are debarred by nature from answering any better purpose under a distant government, deflitute of any neighbouring poffeffion, than that of becoming a nurfery of fmugglers, as they would in earlier days of pirates.

It is undoubtedly become confonant with the views of France, upon other accounts than those of trade, or even the fupply of naval flores, to hold Sweden at all times by the The common interests in the hand. affairs of Germany, which had formed the original bands of union between the two nations, have long fince been done away by a new ftate of affairs, and new arrangements of power and alliance; but the jealoufy and apprehenfion which both, though with different degrees of force, entertain of the overgrown and ftill rapidly increasing power of Ruffia, neceffarily throws them into each others arms. Under this impreffion, France thinks it behoves her to maintain an interest in the north with a power, which in cafe of neceffity might still be rendered capable of great exertions, and which, from the immediate necessity and danger of its own fituation, must ever prove a watchful centinel with respect to the movements and defigues of the power in quefion. But admitting to its utmost extent the propriety of this line of political conduct, it will not appear entirely to justify the ceffion of this island; France knew by experience the means of gratifying Sweden, with little difficulty, in another manner.

Whatever the leading faults or vices of the prefent times may be, it is their great and peculiar characteriffic, and it may be hoped will become their future glory, that a ftrong fpirit of civil liberty, and of enquiry into the functions, obligations, and duties of government, are breaking forth in various places, where they were before fuppofed fcarcely to hold even the feeds of existence. Another no less laudable characteristic is, that spirit of reform and improvement, under the feveral heads of legislation, of the administration of justice, the mitigation of penal laws, the affording fome greater attention to the eafe and fecurity of the lower orders of the people, with the cultivation of those arts most generally useful to mankind, and particularly the public encouragement given to agriculture as an art, which is hecoming prevalent in every part of Europe.

This important revolution in the difpofuions of fo great a part of mankind, may in a great meafure be attributed to the peculiar kind of philofophy cultivated in the prefent age, by men, without doubt, confiderable, and who have given the tafte, and, as we may fay, directed the fashion in literature; though their views have certainly not been favourable to the higheft and most permanent interests of our nature. As the principles they had adopted, or or the path they chofe to fame and eminence, made it necessary for them to attack what have been generally confidered as the great fanctions of morality and duty, they were obliged to counteract the imputation which their tenets might be liable to, by not only profeiling but inculcating the most general and enlarged philanthropy, and by letting loofe all the powers of fatire and invective upon all infringements of natural rights, but more particularly upon those which seemed or were supposed to derive their origin from religious establishments. Thus wit has been often enlifted on the fide of juffice, and led to a more minute and accurate investigation into the principles and boundaries of authority.

If in many respects the force of received opinions has in the prefent times been too much impaired, and perhaps too wide and indifcriminate a fcope given to fpeculation on the domains of antiquity and practice, it is, however, a just cause of triumph, that prejudice and bigotry were the earliest victims. Happy will it be, if the blows which were aimed at the foundations and buttreffes, shall only shake off the uselefs incumbrances of the edifice. And this we are to hope will be the cafe. We may confidently affert, that the utmost freedom of enquiry and discuffion, however subject to partial inconvenience and abufes, must in the end contribute to the benefit of fociety; for whatever finister ambition may warp the defigns of those who endeavour by their writings to direct the opinion of the world, as they address mankind through the channel of their reason, and work with the powers of the understanding, they are obliged to apply themfelves to the cultivation and improvement of the fubject, and of the instruments of their labours. So that at laft the particular views of individuals, philofophers, and fects, being various and fluctuating, will be found to be comparatively but little advanced; while fometimes one, and fometimes another, of those general principles on which the happiness of mankind depend (for these are uniform and permanent) will receive ftrength and vigour from the alternate prevalence of disciplines and opinions.

Even in those countries where despotism, bigotry, and evil governmont, had most benumbed the faculties, and depressed or perverted the genius of the people, they feem now to roufe, and to be fhaking off the lethargy in which they had fo long lain. Of these, none have declined more, whether in a moral or political view, from the rank which they once held among the nations of the world, than the neighbouring kingdoms of Spain and Portugal have done within the two laft centuries; which, derived as they are from the fame origin, feemed to have funk under the fame common malady.

Indeed a new day feems to be opening in Spain; and it is to be hoped (for it is allowed to hope and with it, as none but ungenerous minds could look with pleafure at degraded humanity, even in a rival or enemy, and every thing that really tends to honour and elevate the fpecies, mult fooner or later redound to the benefit of all nations) that the brilliant genius of that people, which has been fo long muffled and rettrained, will foon have proper room for its exertion, and opportunity portunity for its display. The Inquifition, which had to long been the terror and curfe of the nation, though not yet entirely abolithed, is, however, reduced to a fituation like that of an old fubdued lion, whole afpect may flill infpire terror, but whole fangs being drawn and claws pared, is no longer capable of mifchief. The powers of that tribunal are now confined to those glaring and public acts of impiety, prophanenefs, or immorality, which are punishable in all well regulated flates; and in the execution of this finall remaining part of their authority, all their proceedings are to be publicly conducted, and their evidence to be openly taken; publicity of proceedings being the most efficacious corrective of vicious, and prefervative of wholefome inflitutions. This reform, even if carried no farther, muft foon put an end to the odious and infamous race of familiars and fecret informers.

It is peculiarly fortunate to Spain, that the court, the nobility, and higher classes of the nation, should all be feized at the fame time with the fame common fpirit of promo ing a general reform through the country, of erafing ancient prejudices, and of using all means to enlighten the minds of the people. Learning, and an enquiry into the hiftory and antiquities of the country, are liberally encouraged, and fumptuous editions of the most valuable claffics published, under the aufpices of the court; patriotic fo. cieties, under the fanction of the first nobility, are forming in every part of the kingdom, for the effablishment of arts, fciences, and manufactures; for improvements in the cultivation of the earth, and is every part of rural economy; for opening the minds, and mending the morals of the people. For this purpose numerous public fchools have already been indituted, and are daily increafing, while the fludies of youth are to be directed to useful and neceffary objects. Nor is encouragement wanting to the fine arts, although the ufeful, with great propriety in the prefent state of things, meet with a more marked attention. The same patriotic spirit, which feemed to require nothing more than to be awakened in order to its due exertion, is already extending itfelf to public works and defigns of the greatest permanency and national Plans have been formed, utility. fubfcriptions filled, and the works are actually in execution, for the conveyance of water to large districts which had hitherto been defolate through its want, and for opening the way to commerce and industry, by eftablifhing good roads and navigable canals, for facilitating the intercourse between the different provinces of that extensive country ; the want of which could not have been any where more felt.

We have heretoiore feen the meafures adopted by Spain for peopling and cultivating the wide and defolate waltes of the mountainous region of the Sierra Morena, by Rocking them with German colonies; which was done at a great expence, to the amount of about 6000. Α court intrigue, by which the duke d'Aranda, the patriotic and benevolent father of this project, was thrown out of the administration, was among the principal caules, if not the foleone, of its failure. About nine-tenths of the colonists either perifhed in the place, or in their attempts to return home encountered fuch hardfhips, that many were reduced reduced to the neceffity of becoming beggars or vagabonds, or, what may be confidered as a calamity little lefs confiderable, being obliged to inlift in foreign fervice in the countries through which they paffed.

The king has, however, revived the fcheme with great vigour, and no less apparent effect ; fo that there feems now to be a fair prospect of its fucceeding to advantage. Befides taking the remains of the old fettlers, amounting now to about 600, under his immediate protection, and giving new animation and vigour to their industry, he has made an importation of 500 Roman catholic Swifs families. Whether it proceeds from improvements, derived from experience, in the regulation, whether from habits of greater industry in the Swifs, whether the climate is better fuited to their conflitutions than to the natives of northern Germany, or whether from the operation of all thefe, and perhaps other caufes, this colony proceeds much more prosperously than the former. This fuccefs has fo much encouraged the king, that he is making farther and greater importations, and upon a still more improved plan, of Germans, French, and Swifs, to whom great advantages are held out ; their farms being granted in perpetuity upon fome very eafy terms, proper stock provided for them at prefent, and a competent quantity of land tilled and fown at his expence for each family the first year. The expence has been found very great, and has exceeded what even could have been imagined; but it is an expence truly royal, and worthy of a king.

Among other domefic regulations, the king has abolified, or at leaft greatly circumferibed and refricted, the celebration of the bull feafts, which had for fo many centuries been the peculiar and favourite diversion of Spain ; a diversion which foreigners had generally confidered or reprefented as a proof of the prefent barbarism, and an indication of the natural cruelty of the people: politions which should be well weighed before they are in any degree admitted; and which, if at all juft, are fubject to much limitation. The English have been no lefs reproached for their bull-baiting, boxing matches, quarter-staff and cudgel playing, with their general disposition to athletic exercifes, and eagerness to behold fierce combats, whether between their own fpecies or other animals.

Perhaps it is not always confidered, in passing these censures, that man is born to a state of contention and warfare; that he is doomed to ftruggle with difficulties, and is at all times liable to be compelled to oppose and to furmount dangers, or to perifh in the encounter; and that these are circumstances from which no condition of fortune, or state of fociety, can at all times fecure him. It behoves him therefore not to indulge in the idea that he is always to flumber upon beds of rofes; but to strengthen his mind, and harden his body, for the reception of those hard conflicts, from which no humility of character, nor innocency of life, may poffibly afford him an exemption. As man has profited, in many inftances of art and domeflic œconomy, from the example of inferior animals, he need not think it beneath him to improve in the virtues of courage and fortitude from the example of the more generous and noble kinds, as that exhibited by the heroic part of his own species can can rarely come within his immediate knowledge : otherwife, by the indulgence of too refined a delicacy, and the affectation of a fentimental disposition, which is neither fuited to our nature or condition, men may again fink into the deplorable fituation of the Sybarites, and neither be able to endure the fight of blood, nor to hear of danger, until they found themfelves The rough overwhelmed in both. mafculine exercises, and hard perfonal conflicts of the common people; are preparatives to war; they inure men to refistance, to place a confidence in their own powers and address in action, to endure toils, blows, and danger, and to feel all the pride and triumph of victory. Need it be remembered, that the conflicts of herce animals were fpectacles admired by the most celebrated, as well as the most elegant nations of antiquity: and we may add, that it is a gratification, no ways artificial and improper for a reasonable being, to behold any creature exerting the generous energies of his nature.

The king of Spain has, however, prohibited the celebration of bull feaths, excepting only in those cafes where the profits arising from them have been already affigned to fome charitable, benevolent, or patriotic purpose, and that no other fund has yet been appropriated to fupply the deficiency. He has likewife prohibited, under heavy penalties, the use of more than two horses or inules in gentlemen's carriages, within the limits of any of the towns of the kingdom. This injunction was attended with a circular letter to the foreign ministers, enclosing a copy of the edict, and acquainting them respectively, that his catholic ma-Vol. XXVIII.

jefty hoped they would fet an example of compliance to the public, by their own conformity to this new regulation. The motive affigned in the preamble to the edict for thefe prohibitions is, that the former practice occasioned a great deflruction of cattle, and the latter a great wafte of their time and labour, when they might be fo much more advantageoufly employed for the purpofes of agriculture. The affigned motive does not feem at all to hold with refpect to the suppression of the bull feafts, as the animals used in thefe fpectacles were actual wild bulls, taken with great difficulty, and in an abfolute state of nature. in the remotest forests; and these are too fierce and untameable to admit almost the possibility of their being broken down to country fervice.

The liberal difpofition to improvement, at present prevalent in the court of Madrid, is not, however. confined to rural or domestic matters; it feems to reach to every thing, and to every part of their extensive dominions. The king, reflecting upon the number of thips and lives, both foreign and domeftic, which were every year loft upon the coafts of the kingdom, through the want of an accurate knowledge of them, and the imperfection of the old charts, which inftead of being the guides to fafety, frequently led the unwary navigator into error and ruin, generouily and humanely determined to remedy this evil. For the execution of this important purpofe, Don Vincent Tofinode, a man of fcience, and who prefides in the marine academies, has ever fince the conclusion of the peace with England, accompanied by able affiftants, been aniduoufly and fuccefffully employed in furveying and [C]delineatdelineating the coaffs of the kingdom. This is faid to have been done with unexampled care and accuracy, taking in the whole coaff from Cape Saint Vincent to the Streights of Gibraltar, and from thence to the Cape de Creux, on the coaft of Cotalonia, and including the oppofite Barbary fhores. There has not yet been time to publish the charts, but it is expected that they will be found a great nautical improvement, and prove a treasure to mariners.

In the fame fpirit, the king determined that the various accounts of the Streights of Magellan, which have been given by the navigators of different nations, flould be examined and corrected. For this purpose a frigate was dispatched from Cadiz, under the conduct of Don Antonio Cordova of Lalo, who was fo fortunate as in a few months fully to execute his commission. This officer brought home an accurate chart of the streights, in which all the capes, bays, promontories, and other remarkable objects on the oprofite coatts, are diffinetly laid down, with their longitudes, latitudes, and respective diffances, ascertained by aftronomical observation. With all the delays incident to this material fervice, and to the unequalled turbulence of that beifterous climate, they arrived in little more than five weeks from their entering the ftreights at Port St. Joseph, the most southern of the continent. From thence Don Antonio went in his barge to explore the channel of St. Barbe, which lies three leagues from that port, on the coast of the Terra del Fuego, where he found the paffage which had been long conjectured, but never before afcertained, that leads into the South Seas. After examining the weftern parts of the fireight to the Capes Lunes and Providence, which they found to be eleven leagues diftant from those called the Pillars and Victoria, he returned to Port St. Joseph. From thence the frigate returned home through the ftreights, having loft but two men in the course of three months which they ipent in that region of eternal winter, tempefts, and defolation, which had to long been the terror of mariners. It is probable that this ship was indebted for her unufual healthinefs to the admirable and fuccefsful meafures adopted and published by captain Cook for the prefervation of his feamen.

The exertions of Spain for the improvement and increase of her naval power, have not only been unremittingly continued, but carried on with fresh vigour, and in a more extensive degree, fince the conclusion of the war. This fystem will probably continue, fo long as the French influence predominates at the court of Madrid, and the family compact retains its full vigour. This, however, ought not to caufe any great alarm to those who duly weigh the temporary effect and fhort duration of any influence, and the fragil nature of family and all other political compacts. Money may enable princes to build or purchase great fleets, but that alone will be found very unequal to the rendering them effective, or really formidable. Bold and able feamen, with gallant and experienced officers, are treafures not to be purchased. Most of the states of Europe posses a confiderable number of large and well-looking thips of war, and thefe exhibit a formidable appearance of artillery : yet, what figure have they ever ever made, or woald they now make, in action ?

This being, however, the xra of reform and improvement in Spain, fhe is paying an unufual degree of attention to her foreign conimerce and to her colonies, (much furer and more permanent fources of naval ftrength) as well as to the other parts of her political æconomy. Among the inflances of this attention, an East India company, under the name of the Royal Philippine, was established in the beginning of the year 1785. The capital of this company was fixed at 30 millions of livres, being fomething about L. 1,300,000 sterling; of which the old Caraccas company, now united with the new, furnished nine millions, the king five, the bank of "Madrid, and the inhabitants of the Philippine islands, three each; the remaining ten millions were allotted into shares of a thousand livres each, and fubfcribed for by the public at large. The company is charged with the equipment of the merchant fhips deftined for Spanish America, which they are to fupply with European merchandize, and to receive the products of those countries in return. A diferetionary number of fhips are to proceed yearly from Acapulco to the Philippines, with coined filver, corn, fruits, and fach other products or commodities of Europe or America as were found to fuit the market; and with thefe they were to purchase the goods of India and China, for the fupply both of the mother country and her colonies. The company are to have a council of administration at Acapulco, another at Manilia, and a fupreme one at Madrid, which is to receive the correspondence and to controul the conduct of the other two. The king has likewife opened the ports of the Philippine iflands to all nations.

This last measure feems to give fome countenance to a report which has been currently fpread, that the Spanish administration have for some time paft had it in ferious contemplation to break through that narrow fyftem of policy, which has been fo long and fo unremittingly parfued, of reitricting the commerce of Spanish America entirely to the mother country; and that now adopting more liberal ideas, and taking a more clear and feientifical view of the nature both of trade and of colonies, they were actually digefting plans for opening a trade with foreign nations on the weitern coaft of South America, by the conftituting of three free ports in the latter; and that this defign had been fo far advanced, that the ports of Baldivia in Chili, of Bonaventura in New Granada, and of Cinalea in New Mexico, were those proposed for the purpole, and would probably be fixed upon. The time which has elapfed fince the circulation of this report, does not ferve entirely to overthrow its credibility, nor even afford any absolute demonstration that the project is now abandoned, it its former exlitence be admitted; as a meature of fo much novelty and importance, involved in fuch a multitude of complicated confequences, of collateral connections and circumstances, could not but require much nicety of enquiry, as well as much previous and mature confideration.

Though the Spaniards have at all times endeavoured to cover, with a veil of impenetrable obfcurity and fecrecy, the flate, circumdances, and transactions of their colonies in [C] = 2 Southern Southern America, endeavouring, as much as it was in human power, to feelude them from all intercourfe and correspondence with the reft of mankind, yet neither the penalties of laws, the industry and vigilance of power, nor the immensity of feas and defarts, can at all times prevent " the fecrets of the prifon house" from efcaping. Most of the public prints throughout Europe have for fome years abounded with accounts of dangerous rebellions, and even expected revolutions, in Peru, Chili, and other parts of South America. It has even been pretended, that a defcendant of the Incas was at the head of a numerous Indian army, and making fuccefsful efforts to recover the throne, and to re-establish the empire of his anceftors.

Although the extravagance of these accounts was fufficient to deftroy their credibility, even in those things that were poffibly true, yet it may be gathered upon the whole, from the concurrence of circumfiances which did not admit of doubt, that the Spanish dominion in South America has for fome years been confiderably diffurbed by commotions of fome fort or other. Īt would feem, however, in fpeculation (the dim lights afforded us not admitting of any clear view) that these disturbances could not have proceeded entirely, if at all, from the Indians : for, excepting the brave and unconquered nations of Chili (who are not, however, capable of carrying on a diftant or regular war) we hold the Indians to be involved in too great-a multitude of moral, phyfical, and political incapacities, to admit of their acting with that vigour and union, which could alone afford the most distant profpect of recovering their liberties; and that they are too much debilitated, and have been too long broken down to the yoke, to be capable of becoming even the principals in any confiderable commotion.

It is well known, that the old Spanish settlers and natives of that vaft continent, have from time immemorial been exceedingly difcontented with many circumstances in the government and internal administration of those countries. That, in particular, the conftant disposal of all places of truft and emolument to Europeans, has long been regarded by them with the greatest jealoufy and refentment, and confidered as a badge of the most intolerable flavery. That the infupportable arrogance of thefe new comers, the haughty difdain they difplay, and. the contemptuous infolence with which, upon every occafion, they treat the natives, would alone be fufficient to render them odious in the extreme : but when with thefe are reckoned their numberlefs other ill qualities and vices; the avarice and oppression with which they rapidly collect immense fortunes; and their hafly conveyance of them out of the country, as if its plunder had been the only object of their million; it is not to be wondered at that fuch a fystem of oppression, rapacity, and irritation, should beget a mortal averfion to the native Spaniards, and no fmall diflike to the government by which fuch enormities were admitted.

Thefe general caufes, concurring perhaps with other local and particular ones, have undoubtedly laid the foundations of fome confiderable diforders and commotions in Spanifu America, although the means of information are too imperfect to admit mit any exact knowledge of their The refiftance nature and extent. of the British colonies, and the extraordinary revolution which it occafioned, were events, which no powers of government could prevent from coming to the knowledge of the Spanish colonists; and nobody will hold any doubt of the effects which fo fuccefsful and recent an example, and coming fo directly to the point with refpect to themselves, was liable to produce among a difcontented people. It is, however, to be obferved, especially as the fact is not generally known, that fome years before this example was fet, the difcontents in those countries ran fo high, that the most tempting offers were made to the court of London for procuring her fupport and protection. The integrity, justice, and good neighbourhood which she displayed in rejecting that propofal, has fince been fhamefully returned by Spain: although fome cynic at the court of Madrid might poffibly deny the motive, and inflead of afcribing it to honour or justice, hold out, that England was fo much occupied in the scheme of changing the government of her own colonies, that the had not leifure to engage in other projects, and of all things was leaft difpofed to encourage ideas of refiftance in those of any nation.

Thefe difcontents or diffurbances have, however, produced no finall apparent effect upon the Spanifh government with refpect to the administration of their colonies; and it is faid that the measures purfued upon this occasion have been no lefs judicious than vigorous. While large reinforcements of the best and most veteran troops of Spain have been fent out under chosen commanders to that continent, while old fortifications have been repaired and armed, and new ones constructed, the greatest care is faid to have been taken, not only in the appointment of men of the first ability to the respective governments, but that they should likewise be men of a lenient and conciliating disposition, as well as of the most difinterested character. This new fystem of colonial government must undoubtedly produce the happiest effects, if continued; but, notwithstanding its excellency in other respects, is faid to be fo expensive, particularly by the augmentation of the forces upon that establishment, as to trench deeply upon the royal revenues arifing from them; a circumitance too likely to abridge its duration.

We have heretofore had occasion to take notice of the connexion and friendthip which was growing up between Spain and the Porte. M. de Boligny was accordingly fent minister from the court of Madrid to Constantinople, towards the close of the year 1784, where he was received and treated with peculiar marks of diffinction. Among other grand or curious prefents which he delivered from the catholic king at his hrit audience, was a field tent of fingular greatness and magnificence, which derived luftre from its former fervice, as well as veneration from its antiquity. It had been constructed for and used by Ferdinand the Catholic, in the pride of conquest and victory, at the camp of Occanna; it was lined with crimfon velvet, richly trimmed with gold taffels and lace, and containing fuch numerous and spacious apartments as had been fufficient to entertain a large court: the whole furrounded with a spacious gallery.

It feemed fingular enough, that this old memorial of the extermination of infidels, thould be now a prefent from Spain to an infidel power.

The double marriages which took place in the Easter season of 1785, between the royal families of Spain and Portugal, not only ferveu to heal the jealoufies and differences which had to long prevailed between these courts, and to unite the two kingdoms in the clotest bonds of amity, but laid the foundation for that treaty of alliance, which, under the mediation of Spain, has fince taken place between France and Portugal; and which conflitutes a complete union between the latter and the Bourbon family. Thefe marriages were between the infant Don Gabriel of Spain, and the infanta Donna Mariana Victoria, princefs of Portugal, on the one fide, and the infant Don Juan of Portugal, with the infanta Donna Charlotta, eldest daughter of the prince of Atturias, on the other. The infantas met at Villa Viciola, where they were mutually received and delivered; being probably the laft as well as the first opportunity of their meeting.

The patriarchal age, upwards of one hundred and ten years, to which the celebrated archbishop of Seville, the cardinal de Solis, arrived, and in the full possession of all his faculties, quicknefs of hearing only excepted, would in fome degree have rendered his diffolution an object of historical attention, even if his admirable qualities, the goodness of his heart, and the excellency of his life, had not otherwife entitled him to that diffinction. Though he had fpent that long life in the continual exercise of every moral and christian virtue, yet an unbounded charity, and an universal benevolence to mankind, were the flrongly marked lines of his character. He feemed to be the natural as well as the fpiritual father of the numerous flock committed to his charge; and their grateful veneration and affection for him feemed to render them worthy of the care which he beflowed. In answer to the enquiries of his particular friends as to the means which he had used for preferving health, and prolonging life to fo extraordinary a period, he obferved, that by being old when he was young, he found himfelf now young when he was old; that he had led a fober and fludious, but not a lazy or fedentary life; that his diet was delicate, though sparing; that his liquors were the best wines of Xeres and La Mancha, of which he never exceeded a pint at any one meal, excepting in cold weather, when heallowed himfelf a third more; that he rode or walked abroad every day, except in rainy weather, when he took exercife, for a couple of hours, within doors. So far, faid he, 1 took care for the body; " and as " to the mind, I endeavoured to " preferve it in due temper by a fcru-" pulous obedience to the divine " commands, and keeping (as the " apofile directs) a confeience void " of offence towards God and man. " By thefe eafy and innocent means " I have arrived at the age of a " patriarch, with lefs injury to my 6 health and conflictution than many " experience at forty. I am now, " like the ripe corn, ready for the " fickle of death, and, by the mercy " of my Redeemer, have ftrong " hopes of being translated into " his granary." " Glorious old " age ?" exclaimed the king of Spain: " Would to Heaven he had " appointed ** appointed a fucceffor; for the ** people of Seville have been fo -* long ufed to excellence, that they ** will never be fatisfied with the ** beft prelate I can fend them."

This excellent prelate and man, was of an ancient and noble house in the province of Andalusia; and was the last furviving fon of Don Antonio de Solis, historiographer to Philip the IVch, and author of that eloquent and long - admired work, the History of the Conquest of Mexico.

The reform in Portugal has not yet, in importance or magnitude, approached in any degree of proportion to that in Spain. Any attempt, however, at reform or improvement, in a country which has been to long finking under a weak, indolent, capricious, and fometimes cruel fystem of government, and amongst a people immersed in pernicious, destructive, and inveterate habits, should not be estimated merely by its present benefits, but confidered likewife with a view to its farther operation, and hailed as the omen of greater and happier effects; the first step being generally the greatest difficulty in fuch cafes.

The government of that country feems, fo far as we can judge, to have been very laudably adminiflered fince the acceffion of the prefeut queen; and while it has maintained refpect abroad, has had the good fortune to attain the effeem and affection of the people at home. The measure of improvement which we have particularly to take notice of, relates to the police, to the due administration of criminal juffice, and to a first infliction of the law in all cases of an atrocious nature, particularly with refpect to great offenders. In no other country in Europe were fo great a number of idle vagabonds fuffered to loiter about the streets, and to infest the towns, as in Portugal; and thefe wretches having no apparent means of obtaining a livelihood, excepting the cafual and infufficient refources of charity, were of neceffity the peils of fociety, and fpent their lives in watching opportunities for the commission of every fpecies of villainy. In few civilized countries, likewife, had the abominable crime of affaffination been refined fo much into a fystem, and carried to fo glaring and daring a pitch of enormity; and this not fo much from any defect in the laws, as from the impunity which the great and their dependents derived, through the ease, if not certainty, with which pardons were procured This could by rank and influence. not but flacken the nerves of juffice with respect to the other classes of the people; as it would have appeared too barefaced and fhamelefs a mockery of it, to purfue fmall delinquents to the utmost extremity, for those crimes which were passed over without account in their fuperiors.

The queen feized the opportunity afforded by an affaffination, which was attended with circumftances of the most atrocious nature, and where interest and power feemed to have the most certain prospect of procuring their usual impunity, not only refolutely to refift and politively to reject all folicitations for a pardon, but at the fame time to make a public declaration, that fhe never would, in any inftance, whatever the rank or quality of the offender might be, grant a pardon to any perfon guilty of a premeditated murder. Never did [C] 4 any any act of wifdom or juffice produce a more fpeedy or more happy effect. Affaffination is now no longer heard of; and it may well be hoped that the very paffions which gave birth to it will in a great meature wear away, fince they are cut off from their ultimate gratification.

This opening to reform and good government was fucceeded by the excellent measure of taking up and providing for the idle and vicious, who had no visible means of living, wherever they were found in every part of the kingdom. Thefe vagabonds were either remitted to their respective countries, under fuch regulations and means of coercion, as would compel them to become ufeful by a clofe application to the labours of hufbandry, or were taken immediately into the hands of government, and being provided with due provisions and necessaries at its charge, were applied under its infpection to fuch works as were fuited to their respective ability.

Some confiderable attempts have likewife been made for the improvement of agriculture, and the introduction of a better fystem of cultivation among the farmers in Portugal. The immenfe fums of money fent every year into Spain for corn, and the conftant drain upon the fpecie of the country by other nations for the fame article, firongly urged the neceffity of endeavouring at leaft to leffen the evil, by increafing the home production of grain. It is, however, generally vain to war against the decrees of nature. Portugal, like other countries, has its peculiar products, but neither the foil or climate feem capable of admitting any great and effential improvements in agriculture. The former is generally too thin and light for the production of grain in any degree that would repay the labour and expence of the huibandman, while the great heats and long droughts would frequently check the progress of vegetation in the bud, were the foil even deeper and better. Some neglected vallies have indeed been difcovered, which had hitherto efcaped culture, and which being coated with a thicker if not better mould, and accordingly refifting the heat more, and retaining their moifture longer than common, have answered kindly to the plough, and produced fuch crops as were fufficient to excite hope and admiration in a country generally fterile of grain. But it is too much to be apprehended, that the quantity of fuch valuable foil to be difcovered in the kingdom, will not be fufficient to produce any very material change in the general product: the addition of a few hundred acres of new fertile ground is a fmall matter indeed with refpect to the fupply of a nation. Thefe attempts, however, at improvements in agriculture, gave occasion to a report, which was generally fpread and credited, that it had been either in contemplation or act to make a great reduction of the vineyards in Portugal, and to convert the foil into arable land. This measure might perhaps have been defirable if it had been practicable; but the misfortune is, that the land covered with vines in that rocky and mountainous country, is feldom fit for the growing of corn, and would not probably have turned out fo profitably under any other mode of culture as it does under the prefent, which feems to be that fuited to its nature. Indeed, if the unwearied wearied industry, which once made the mountains of Granada fmile in unexampled verdure and beauty under the cultivation of the unfortunate Moors, could be transferred to Portugal, fome hopes might be entertained, notwithstanding the inferiority of the country in foil and climate, of being thereby able to fupply the defects of nature. As things really are, fhe must continue to exchange her native products for those which she wants from other nations; and if these are not equivalent to a full fupply, fortune has abundantly fupplied her with other means, by those inexhaustible sources of gold and diamonds with which the has fo liberally endowed her in the new world.

The late intimacy and friendflip grown up with Spain, and the new alliances concluded with that kingdom and France, are likely for fome time to infure eafe and fecurity to the government of Portugal. The political wifdom of drawing the ties still straiter with the former, by the double marriages which have taken place, may, however, be well called in question; for it may be laid down as a political axiom of the greatest weight and importance, that nothing can be more dangerous to the fafety and independence of a weaker state, than the entering into any ties of affinity with a near neighbour, who is much its The weaker fuperior in power. state, for the present funshine of a transitory fummer, frequently entails upon itfelf all the rigours of a long, fevere, and perhaps eternal winter. Portugal has already, by undergoing a degree of ruin from which fhe can never entirely recover, most deplorably experienced the truth of this position. Spain herfelf can atteft its truth. Neither oaths nor treaties could fave her from falling into the hands of the house of Bourbon; from being for a long courfe of years fubjected to all the calamities of foreign and civil wars raging in her very bowels; and from her being at length facrificed to interests inimical to her own, and rendered the flanding dupe of foreign councils. How dearly has Courland paid for the honour of a May day wedding with a daughter of Peter the Great? But every part of hiftory abounds with fuch inflances, and there are few countries that cannot shew present examples of them. If the fironger state has any old claims (as in the prefent cafe) which only lie dormant through the want of a proper opportunity for enforcing them, then the new connection of affinity is the more imprudent, and becomes the more dangerous in its confequences. Every minority, every weak administration, every change of fucceffion, every public lofs, and every discontent of the people, will afford a colour or pretence for the fatal interference of the greater power. But the misfortune is, that fovereigns, acting merely like private perfons in the disposal of their children, look no farther than to their inmediate family interests and fatisfaction, while they entirely overlook the fecurity and profperity of the people whom they govern, and to whom they owe every thing. In no country could an error of this nature be more dangerous than in Portugal; as the animofity between that people and the Spaniards is fo extreme and incurable, that no union of government can take place between them, in which the dependent nation must not be reduced to

to extreme milery, and to the most abject flate of degradation.

It feems that the prepofterous marriages between uncles and nieces, nephews and aunts, which fo peculiarly diffinguished the royal line of Portugal, and which cufform had rendered too familiar, began at length to threaten the extinction of the houfe of Bragauza, through the failure of iffue to which these marriages were fo naturally liable; and this alarming confideration, along with the defire of cancelling all pait jealouhes, and cementing friendship and good neighbourhood with Spain, were the motives which led to the measure in question. For the marriage between the prince of Brazil and his aunt, not having hitherto proved propitious, and the profpect of iffue from it being now probably hopelefs, it became necessary that his brother Don Juan should in time procure a wife that feemed capable of supplying that defect.

Italy has suffered the hard fortune of late years, of being more diffinguished by volcanoes, earthquakes, and the calamities incident to those awful and deftructive phenomena of nature, than by those great actions, or those splendid exertions of talents and fcience, which have in fuch early ages, and at fuch remote periods, either exhibited her as the fcourge and terror, or as the inftructrefs, civilizer, and admiration of mankind She is not, however, even at the prefent day, deftitute of fcience, philosophy, or of learned men, who dedicating their time and labours to the most uleful fludies and beneficial purluits, afford honourable testimonies that her ancient genius is by no means extinguifhed; and that whatever, in the vicifitudes of fashion, disposition, and things, fhe may have loft in the practical arts, has been amply fupplied in other refpects not lefs uleful.

It was little to be expected that the prefent degradation of the papacy, and that unexampled lofs of power and refource which the court of Rome has within lefs than an age fuftained, flould have been dignified by a public labour of fuch magnitude and utility, as would have done honour to ancient Rome in the days of her pride and glory. The prefent pontiff, Pius the VIth, has, however, determined to render his name and age memorable, by gallantly undertaking, and bravely perfevering in the Herculean task of draining the Pontine marshes; an undertaking the more meritorious, and indeed glorious, as feveral of his predeceffors, as well as of the western emperors, had already failed in the attempt; which had accordingly been long confidered as hopelefs.

The pope has been engaged for fome years, with unwearied perfeverance, and at an immenie expence, in the profecution of this defign; and the fuccefs with which it has already been attended, feems to warrant an assurance that it will not be abandoned. It is, however, to be wished, that the man who had courage and generofity, fo late in life, to venture upon fo great an undertaking, and nobly to apply his wealth to the prefent and future benefit of mankind, may have the pleasure of seeing its accomplishment, and of reaping, without diminution, that glory which he fo amply merits. The Appian Way, which had for fo many ages been loft, and buried under a deep morafs, has at length been recovered, cleared.

ed, repaired, and will foon be rendered paffable, houses being already built for the convenience of travellers, and facility of commerce, and a time fixed for the post to pass that way. But thefe are only a fmall part of the benefits to be derived from this admirable improvement. Befides recovering a large tract of fertile land to the ule of the public, which has fo long been only the noifome fource of ftench and peffilential exhalations, and greatly adorning and beautifying the face of the country, it will in time have the happy effect of contributing greatly to purify the air, and of tending to prevent those dangerous and fatal diforders, which, as regularly as the leafon, every fummer infest for many miles the environs of Rome. It will likewife tend more remotely to a fimilar draining an improvement of the Campania in general, and of rendering it again the feat of population and culture, if not of beauty, which it was in the hands of the ancient Romans. Upon the whole it will, if completed, be a work truly royal, and worthy the emulation of kings!

Some differences which tubfifted between the courts of Maples and Madrid, originating entirely in private and family matters and jealoufies, and feeming now to be entirely done away, do not require any particular notice. The young king felt and displayed the right he had to an emancipation from direction, and to think and act as an independent sovereign, sooner than was probably withed or expected; nor does he perliaps pay all that regard to foreign views and interefts, which those grown old in syftem, and habituated to a certain political creed, from which no deviation was to be admitted, might think abiolutely neceffary. That. increase of courage, force, and depredation, which has of late fo eminently and dangeroufly diffinguished the piratical states of Barbary. and fo greatly and justly alarmed all the christian nations bordering on the Mediterranean, has occasioned the king of Naples to pay an attention to the forming of a marine force, which had not been before known in this newly-revived monarchy, although fo peculiarly demanded by its fituation.

The Neapolitans can now boaft more than one thip of the line, of their own construction, besides several good frigates, and a confiderable force in gallies, and the other veffels peculiar to that fea; and can farther boast of having behaved with diffinguished courage, and acquir. ing no fmall honour in the laft attacks made b. Spain upon Algiers. The king feems himfelf to have a peculiar disposition to naval affairs, which may be gathered not only from the marked diffinction with which he has conflantly treated those British commanders of royal ships or fquadrons that have arrived in the bay of Naples, but from the curious attention with which he examined the conitruction and manner of working of their veffels, and the evident pleafure with which he has regarded their various evolutions.

We have heretofore had occafion more than once to pay due praife to the grand duke of Tufcany, for the many excellent regulations which he had introduced into the government of that dutchy, with refpect to the administration both of ccclefiastical and fecular affairs; and have particularly applauded the reforms which he had made in the 1

difpensation of civil and criminal juffice, and the mitigation of penal punifhments This difpolition continues with unabating, and, perhaps, increasing force; and there is no difpofition which requires a more cautious guard or conftant check upon it, than that which leads to reform, for it eafily and imperceptibly grows into a paffion for innovation; becomes capricious or cruel, as circumitance or opposition, the infirmity of nature, or obfinacy of age, may chance to give it a bias; will at length facrifice the inherent rights, or dearest feelings of mankind, to the petty gratification of rounding a system, or the hope of framing fome clockwork eftablishment of things, which their nature forbids to exift; and thus may end in the most absolute and deplorable tyranny of mind and body.

The failure of fo many of his brother, the emperor's, multifarious projects, and the ill-will and ridicule of which a much greater number were fo abundantly productive, and particularly the opposition made by that part of his fubjects, which had been the longest inured to hereditary defpotifm, to the edict for confuming the dead bodies of their friends in lime, and which, notwithstanding his vaft power, and a perieverance, which is fuppofed to be closely allied to obitinacy, he found it necessary to recal, might have afforded fufficient warning to the grand duke, not to be too hafty in violating the common feelings, and general opinions, or even prejudices of mankind.

Yet, without regard to thefe confiderations or examples, the inhabitants of the ancient and beautiful eity of Florence are compelled eternally to refign the dead bodies of their dearest friends, within a short limited term after their deceafe, without any distinction of age, fex, beauty, rank, or quality, into the rude and vulgar hands of that loweft clafs of mankind, who could alone be found to fubmit to fo odious an employment. All the circumstances relative to this difpofal of the dead, are odious and horrid in the extreme. A machine, upon the conftruction of a waggon, and large enough to contain all the dead of the city, calls about midnight; the body must be delivered stark naked, and is thrown headlong into this common receptacle, amidit the carcafes of all forts, and in all states of diftemper, which it already holds; fo that the grave is not neceffary in this inflance to level all diffinction : the friends and relations can neither fee, hear, or know any thing farther of the loved hushand, wife, child, or parent. The horrid waggon is driven in the dark to a walled cemetery, at a few miles diffance, where the bodies are thrown promifcuoufly into one common grave : the thief, the murderer, and those whose bodies are already putrid with the most loathfome diffempers, being thus indiferiminately blended with learning, virtue, courage, the unfpotted matron of high rank, and the modelt delicate virgin, whofe opening beauties feem yet fearcely faded.

Such an outrage upon all the feelings and habits of humanity, upon those mournful duties and attentions to the remains of the deceased, which time and piety had rendered facred in almost all ages and countries, to the laws of decorum and decency, and to the delicacy of the foster fex, has feldom been attempted. The dreadful engrmities mities to which the bodies may in fome cafes be fubjected, under the ruffianly hands to which they are committed, will be felt by those who know the profligacy of mankind.

It needs fcarcely to be mentioned, that this regulation, if it deferves fo gentle a name, has excited the utmoft difguft and horror in the inhabitants of Florence and its environs; particularly those of the fuperior orders. It is faid that the nobility have abandoned their beautiful villas, whether in fight of the cemetery, or in the neighbourhood of the road through which the horrible night-waggon takes its stated courfe. Pasquinades, epigrams, and bitter private complaints and reflections, afford the only vent which the people have yet found for their indignation and grief. In this flate of vexation, the measure in question has been feverely attributed to the arbitrary fevelling disposition of the house of Austria, who wishing to eftablish European government upon what is commonly but erroneoufly supposed the Asiatic model and principle, would with to deftroy all the usual distinctions among men, and to reduce them to the fimple condition of fovereigns and flaves. It is indeed to be regretted, that the grand duke, who in other respects has done much to the fatisfaction and for the good of his subjects, and thereby gained their affection in a very confiderable degree, fhould thus have hazarded his well-earned popularity, by haftily adopting a project fo evidently repugnant to general opinion, and which carried with it the appearance of invading the common rights, and wantonly fporting with the tendereft feelings of mankind.

T HE republic of Venice feems for fome time past to have been rather departing from that quiefcent and pacific fyftem, which has been fo peculiarly her characteriftic fince the beginning of the prefent century. Befides her late quarrel with the Dutch, which, confidering the extreme obstinacy, and a fort of fifterly captions and jealoufy which appeared in both the parties, would not have been eafily qualified, if the ill humour of one had not been fuddenly arrefted by immediate and imminent danger, the has ever fince been engaged in an expensive and unprofitable maritime war with the regency of Tunis. We do not recollect that the occafions for this war were greater, or the offences given of a deeper dye, than those which usually occur in transactions with the African flates. The Venetian fleet have, however, repeatedly infulted the coafts of that kingdom, have cannonaded and bombarded, with lefs or greater effect, feveral of the Tunifian ports or maritime fortreffes, and have particularly fucceeded in deftroying the defences of Sfax, and laying the town in affies.

Although from that commercial difpolition which fo fingularly diftinguishes the state of Tunis, a war of this nature is infinitely more prejudicial to it than it would to any other of the Barbary powers, yet the obflinacy of the dey has hitherto appeared unconquerable. He had laid it down at the beginning, as a principle never to be departed from, that a full indemnification, on the fide of Venice, for all the expences he had been put to in arming and defence, and every lofs which he or his fubjects fuffained in the war, fhould be the fine qua non, the leading preliminary to a peace; and without which no terms of accommodation can ever be received or liftened to. To this refolution he has adhered with the utmost inflexibility; and the republic is in the firange fituation, that every fuccels the gains only ferves to render the conclusion of peace the more impracticable. Their admiral Emo, has, however, gained confiderable credit and applaufe by his conduct and exertions, and their marine fome reputation and experience in this war. Perhaps the old lion of St. Mark is only whetting his claws and trying his friength in finall adventure, in order to prepare himfelf for fome harder and greater encounter, which he forefees the probable occasion for in that guarter of Europe. It is indeed probable, confidering the oconomical disposition of the republic, that the war war with Tunis is only a pretext for keeping up a confiderable naval armament.

While the commercial state of Venice is addreffing itfelf to arms, the emperor has already experienced that difappointment in his commercial fchemes, to which those are liable who attempt to over-rule or counteract the defigns of nature, in that distribution which she has thought fit to make of advantage or incommodity to the various fituati-This disappointons of mankind. ment was the more fenfibly felt, as it affected that favourite and captivating part of his projects, which was to render the remote tails or outskirts of his widely extended continental dominions, the fources of a great and productive commerce with the eastern world. The Afiatic company of Oftend and Triefte, which had been fo much the faveurite object of his nurture, care and . hope, and which probably afforded a leading motive for his quarrel with Hollar.d, and attempt of opening the Scheldt, became bankrupt for the heavy fum of twenty millions of French livres, early in the fummer of 1785. This heavy blow, which feverely affected the whole rifing commerce of the Austrian Netherlauds, and the monied men in other parts of his dominions, as well as foreigners, was faid to have been accelerated by the fpirit of fome Dutch merchants, whole indignation being excited at the unjust claims which they conceived that prince was making upon their country, procured, as a measure of retaliation, bills for a great amount to be drawn upon the Afiatic company from Paris; and thefe being unexpectedly prefented, and, in the usual mercantile manner, protefted for non-payment, this excited fo great and fudden an alarm among the other creditors, that the Count de Preli, the principal or oftenfible director, was obliged to abfcond, and the whole commercial fabric fell at once to the ground. It was not, however, now necellary to eftablish the axiom, that commerce, at leaft in her nonage, must walk flowly and regularly, with peace in one hand, and with juffice in the other, if the expects to grow or to floorifh; and that unbridled power, immenfe flanding armies, views of conqueft, and rapacious violations of good faith and neighbourhood, are atterly incompatible with her profperity, whole arts are all of the conciliatory kind.

Nor does it feem that the emperot has been much more fortunate in his other commercial projects than in his East India adventure. Even the new trade of the Danube and Black Sea, from which fuch wonders had been expected, and which had been to hardly wretted from the Porte in the hour of diffreis and danger, is faid to have hitherto afforded little more than ditappointmeat and lofs; nor is the commerce of the Adriatic reprefented as being much more productive. In the mean time, the internal commerce of his dominions, which is naturally very great and productive, and capable of prodigious improvement, is diffurbed and overlaid by that infinite feries of edicts and regulations, which frequently militating with each other, as well as with all the principles of trade, are deftructive of that quiet, flability. and power of free agency, which are effential to its existence; and which, if they do not prove ruinous to those already concerned, will at leait least deter others from hazarding their property upon fuch quickfand foundations. Among these are to be reckoned those heavy duties, amounting in effect to prohibitions, which were laid upon various English manufactures, particularly those of iron and feel, which, from their extravagance, and the failure of confidering or understanding their certain or probable confequences, carried their own overthrow along with them, and have accordingly been fince either abolished or modified. This has, however, been confidered rather as a political measure, than a mere act of commercial regulation, and attributed to the refertment excited by the king of Great Britain's accession, as elector of Hanover, to the Germanic league, which was an object of fo much jealoufy and vexation to the court of Vienna.

Of the numerous innovations which are faid to have occasioned fo much difgust and diffatisfaction among the Hungarians, few could feem better calculated for that purpose, especially to a proud, fierce and fuperfiitious people, violently attached to their old manners and habits, and ftill vain of a liberty and glory which have been long defunct, than the measure adopted by the emperor in the year 1784, of removing their ancient crown and regalia from Prefburgh to Vienna. The crown was fortified with all those fanctions, which in paft ages could render it the fupposed palladium of a country. It had been a prefent fo long ago as the year 1000, from Pope Sylvester the IId to St. Stephen, then king of Hungary; fo that all the reverence of fanctity was added to that communicated by time. The crown was of pure and folid gold, and, to flamp the greater value on it, it was made after the fashion of that work by the Greek emperors; it was adorned with an emerald of great fize, and feveral hundreds of rubies, fauphires and pearls; befides being ornamented with images of the apofiles and patriarchs in maffy gold. The pope added to the crown a donation of a large filver crofs, which was afterwards inferted in the arms of Hungary, and afforded an opportunity to its kings to affume the title of Apostolic; a title latterly revived and affumed by the late Maria Therefa; who was crowned queen of Hungary with this regalia at Prefburgh, in the days of her greatest tribulation. These, with the sceptre and globe of the kingdom, which boafted, besides their antiquity, being made of pure Arabian gold, a magnificent two-edged fword, and a curious mantle for coronations, richly wrought in gold with figures, images, and infcriptions, by Gifele, the celebrated confort of St. Stephen, were all carried away to Vienna.

It feemed rather a wanton fporting with the feelings of fuch a people, to deprive them of these vestiges of loft royalty, and harmlefs objects of national pride. If it was any relief or gratification to a people, bending under the irkfome weight of a foreign yoke, to fee that their masters were once in their lives under a necessity of visiting them, and of receiving the infignia of royalty and government at their hands, why fhould they not be indulged in foinnocent a gratification? Nor is the necessity of fuch observances, however trivial they may appear, entirely unimportant to a people, as they are fymbols of their connection with the governing power, and ferve occafionally to remind it.

it of its duties. Feeble ties indeed ! but what ties are ftrong to controul the extravagancies of power? All we can do is to fupply with number the deficiency of strength, and to hope that those leffer ones may operate on the imagination, where the greater fanctions fail to lay hold upon the levity, or to fubdue the viciousness of our nature. The spirits of the Hungarians have been too much broken, and the measures of late years purfued to make them degenerate from their antient character, have been too fuccessful, for this or any other measure to produce any much greater effect than that of private murmur. Indeed, what spirits could remain unbroken, under the controul of a flanding army of 300,000 men?

The Arch Duke Maximilian's acceffion to the electorate of Cologne, and to its great appendage the fovereign bishopric of Munster, (which forms fo potent a principality in itself) upon the death of the late elector, in 1784, was no novelty in the affairs of Germany, as being a matter already fettled by his previous election to the coadjutorship; an election which we may remember had been warmly, and with much ftrength of reafoning and political judgment; oppofed by the king of Pruffia; though the fuperiority of the Auftrian intereft rendered his arguments and interposition ineffectual. This prince has hitherto taken no apparent part in the general politics of Germany; and by the attention he pays to the government of his electorate, and the good of his fubjects, has already acquired their affection, as well as the efteem of his neighbours, in a very confiderable degree; and which a wife and munificent difpofal of his Vol. XXVIII.

The extraordinary change which has taken place in the circumstances of the three ecclefiaffical electorates, within lefs than an age, whether confidered with regard to improvements in civil or ecclefiaftical government, to the wearing-off of prejudices, the extension of religious toleration, to the introduction of a judicious fystem of education, the establishment of public fchools, and the encouragement given to learning, and the cultivation of the arts and fciences among the fuperior claffes of the people, is in every refpect truly furprifing; and will be confidered as the more admirable, under the reflection that thefe great improvements are not the effect of any religious or political revolution, of any change in the order or nature of government, nor of any foreign or domeftic violence upon the difposition either of princes or people.

A pafforal letter, which was iffued in the year 1784, by the elector and archbifhop of Triers to his clergy, will ferve confiderably to illuftrate this obfervation, and is the more remarkable, as that prince (who is of the houfe of Saxony) is confidered as being peculiarly attached to the tenets of that church of which he is fo confiderable a member; and that the outwerd marks of his zeal in that refpect have gone much beyond any that have been difplayed by his brethren of Mentz and Cologne.

This curious patternal letter will, however, speak for him and for itfelf. After stating to his clergy the objects which they should have in view, and the conduct which they [D] should fhould obferve in the discharge of those facred functions to which they are affigned ; he dwells particularly upon the inftructions which they should give to the people on religious fubjects ; and firictly charges the rectors to confine themfelves in their fermons to morality, and to the practical duties of a virtuons life, which all may understand and profit by, instead of entering into abstrufe questions and theological difquifitions, which, beyond the capacity of most of their auditors, ferve only to excite troublefome or dangerous doubts, and to diffuse an idle spirit of disputation, which frequently tends to the treating of the most delicate or facred subjects with irreverence. He then strictly prefcribes that all luxury fhould be banished from the churches : observing (rather in the fentiments of a prefbyter of a reformed church, than the language of a Roman Catholic prince and prelate) " That neatnefs and decency are all that are befitting the Houfe of the Lord :" that, on days of ceremony, worldly magnificence should be avoided, the effect of which was to excite more of curiofity than of devotion; and forbids that the mufic of the theatres should ever be brought into the churches. He enjoins the paffors to use their utmost endeavours to undeceive and to wean the people from their prefent abfurd notions and prejudices, concerning wizards, phantoms, fpells, and raifing the devil, all of which are the offspring of the groffeft folly and ignorance; that they shall discharge to their flocks the respective functions of fathers, judges, and fpiritual phyficians; that they fould vifit them frequently; and that they should never, except in cafes of absolute necessity, send fubflitutes to fupply their own place among the poor, who are those that fland most in need of consolation and affistance.

It should not be forgotten here, that the Elector of Mentz has commenced a reform of the ecclefiattical orders in his dominion ; that he has already obtained the confent of the pope for the suppression of three monafteries, and has applied their revenues to the support of the univerfity, and to the use of some of the new fchools, which, upon the plan of an improved fystem of education, have been inftituted and most liberally endowed by himfelf. It may likewife be a matter of fome curiofity to take notice, that the Bible, in the language of the country, is frequently to be met with in the hands of the Roman Catholic inhabitants of that electorate; and that the clergy have for feveral years permitted it to be read, under some very moderate restrictions with refpect to the age and qualifications of the parties applying.

We now return to affairs merely political. The fudden death of the landgrave of Heffe Caffel, which happened on the last of October 1785, was not capable of producing any immediate effect on the public flate of Germany; his eldest fon, William, count of Hanau, who was then turned of forty years of age, fucceeding of courfe in his poffetfions. The late landgrave had, during his father's life-time, and folong ago as the year 1754, departed fo far from the religious principles of his ancestors, as to enter into the Roman Catholic communion; which, however, producing no change in the flate of the government, nor in the condition or perfuasion of his fubjects, was to be confidered mere-1yr ly as a private transaction. It is well known that he had lived for many ye rs upon very ill terms with the princefs Mary, his confort, who was a daughter of England; and he is faid to have been much difpofed to French interefts and politics, although the love of money induced him to hire his troops to England in the American war. The political fentiments of the prefent landgrave are faid to be directly the reverse of those held by his father ; and as he is clofely allied in blood, fo he is faid to be no lefs attached by difpolition to the interests of the reigning family of Great Britain. The valt funis of money which that country and family have drawn from England through the courfe of the late war, together with the very large pecuniary legacies which have been fince willed to the latter by the princefs Amelia, feem to afford them the means, along with the military turn of the people, the arbitrary nature of the government, and their large hereditary poffeffions, of becoming very potent in Germany; and it may well be prefumed, will have no finall effect in supporting their claim to the ninth electorate; a bufinefs which lies fo long dormant, through the clashing of the great political interests that divide the empire.

The fpringing up of a new prophet in the Upper Afia (an inflance of ambition under a different charafter) might, at certain periods, have been confidered as the indication of fome extraordinary revolution in the Eaftern world. But the general difpofition of things in the prefent day is far from being favourable to the growth, in any great degree, of fuch impoflures; and even in those regions which feemed at all times to have been peculiarly adapted by nature or circumflance to the production of fanatical enthufiafm, checks and difficulties now occur, which prevent the former dangerous and wonderful effects from taking place.

The Sheich Manfour pretended that he was pre-doomed by the eternai and immutable decrees of Heaven to fill up the measure of divine revelation to mankind; that as he was the laft prophet that ever was to appear, fo he was to close up and to affix the feal to the ordinances of Providence; that he was not fent to fubvert the inflitutes and doctrine of Mahomet, whofe miffion was equally divine with his own, but to reftore them to their original purity, with fuch additions and alterations as the prefent flate of things rendered necessary; that the foreknown corruptions of mankind, and of the text and doctrines of Mahomet, had occasioned his being predeftined from the beginning to this great and important office. As the reform of mankind was to be now general and complete, and that the obstinacy of many infidels was too incorrigible to be wrought upon by perfuation, or even by miracle, fo, in imitation of his great prototype, he affumed the ufe of the fword, as well as of the fpirit, for the accomplishment of that great work.

It was at first given out that it was his object entirely to overthrow the doctrine of Mahomet, and to erect a new edifice upon its ruins; and that, reprefenting the miffion of that prophet as completed, and his power and authority in the government of this world as expired, he had forbidden the pilgrimages to Mecca, and all acts of devotion to him, as unlawful. But thefe ac-[D] z counts counts do not accord with fubfequentwell-fapported circumflances; and it feems probable that he only pretended that his new miffion was intended to reform the doctrines, and to fupply the deficiencies of the former, with fuch additions as the prefent state of mankind required, and the new lights communicated to him prefcribed; but at the fame time affuming greater powers, as the last prophet, than had been communicated to the former, or to any other; for it is to be remembered that the fcriptures, especially the old, form much of the groundwork for all Mahometan reformers and prophets. It is also probable that the impostor's doctrines and pretensions varied according to circumstances, the effect which he found they produced, and the condition or temper of his hearers; that the language which he held with the Turkish theologians was probably very different from that used to his barbarous followers; and that, even among them, great myfteries were referved for the choien few.

The wide and defolate regions bordering on the Cafpian fea were for various caufes, particularly their remoteness, the diversity and weaknefs of their governments, with the ignorance and fuperstition of the people, the best chosen scene for the new prophet's exhibition that perhaps the world in the prefent day could have afforded. He had accordingly made a confiderable progrefs in his undertaking before he was heard of at Conflantinople, and then he was reprefented as being already at the head of a multitude of armed enthufiafts, and that be intended nothing lefs than the fubversion of the established religion.

In the prefent convulfed and difordered flate of the empire this intelligence could not but caufe much alarm to the Porte; they were not ignorant of the effect which a pretended revelation from heaven might produce in countries fo prone to religious delution; and they knew that the refflefs temper of thefe barbarous nations rendered them at all times ready to follow any leader, without even the pretence of religion, who held out profpects of war and fpoil to them. The innumerable fects into which the Mahometan religion is fplit, and the extraordinary opinions held by many of them, feemed likewife to open the way for any bold innovator, who pretended to new lights, and an extraordinary fanctity, to accomplish a dangerous revolution.

Orders were accordingly difpatched to the Turkish commanders in Armenia and the adjoining countries, to be fludioufly upon their guard against the defigns of the impostor; and at the fame time that they narrowly watched his motions and conduct, and endeavoured to penetrate into his real character and defigns, to abflain from any wanton outrage against him or his foilow-Turkish divines and theoloers. gians were likewife commissioned to confer with him, to enquire into his religious opinions, and particularly into the objects of his pretended miffion. The remoteness of the fcene, with the difficulties of communication, and of obtaining intelligence in these waste and wide countries, whole limits are fcarcely known by their immediate rulers, occafioned long anxious expectation at Constantinople for the refult of these enquiries. It however at length appeared, that the prophet had had given full fatisfaction to the deputed divines on the fubject of religion, and the orthodoxy of his principles; but what was of infinitely more importance than his religious tenets, it was at the fame time difcovered, that all the military fury of his zeal was directed againft the Chriftians; they being the infidels, whofe conversion being hopelefs, rendered their extermination neceffary.

This intelligence was foon farther confirmed, by the new faint's commencing, at the head of his followers, a fierce war against the Georgians; and they being allied with the Ruffians, and his enmity being directed equally against all Christians, this original object of alarm foon became an useful instrument of the Turkish government. For he founded the alarm among the Leffghis, and all the other nations of Caucafean Tartars (who have in all ages been among the fiercest, bravest, and most independent of mankind) of the danger to which their religion and liberties were exposed, through the power and near approach of the Ruffians; and thus contributed to the forming of a general combination against them, at a time when the Porte, from the critical fituation of her affairs, however dangerous and fatal fhe knew their progrefs in that quarter would be to her interests and fafety, could not venture to make any direct opposition to their defigns.

Among the other extraordinary conceffions which the emperor extorted from the Porte, not as the price of his friendship (for that was not even pretended) but merely of his prefent quiescence, none could be more fingular in the conception, or extravagantly unreafonable and unjust in the demand, than that of his requiring payment at Conftantinople for the loffes which his fubjects had fultained from the piracies of the Barbary flates, together with the reftoration of the captives; and a peremptory requisition that they fhould in future be entirely freed from their depredations. It was in vain shewn that the grand fignior held no fuch authority at prefent over those states as could in any degree enable him to reftrain their piracies, or even warrant his making such a demand upon them; that he was not in a condition to compel them to any meafures which were contrary to their own interefts or likings; but that, if it had been otherwife, it would be as contrary to juffice as to reason, that, having no complaint against them himself, he should enter into such a war on the account of another; that the idea of his being answerable for their piracies, and making good the loffes fuftained by them, was fo extravagant in its nature, that it could fearcely be fuppofed it was ferioufly adopted.

The arrogance of power on the one fide, and a fearful fenfe of it on the other, could not but produce humiliating effects. The Barbary ftates have, of late years, fhaken off almost every appearance of dependance on the Porte, (nor was that at any time fo perfect as to restrain their piracies) and the Algerines not long fince refused, with the greatest infolence, to pay a fmall customary tribute upon the acceffion of a new dey. Yet the grand fignior found himfelf under the neceffity of fuing to his old vaffals to afford that fecurity to the emperor's new commerce at Triefle and  $[D]_{3}$ Fiume. Fiume, (who had not a fingle fhip or frigate of war for its protection) which the old trading powers of the Mediterranean, pofletied of confiderable naval force, cannot procure for themfelves. It cannot be doubted that fome refpect for paft dignity, a regard to the general interefts and fecurity of the Mahometan religion, with a confideration of the fhaken and critical flate of the Ottoman empire, were the motives that operated with the piratical flates of Barbary in granting a peace to the emperor's fubjects.

We have before taken notice of the progrefs which arts and general knowledge are making in Conftantinople, and that the grand fignior had himfelf ordered the erection of printing-preffes. He has fince gone farther, and has ordered editions of the Ottoman Hiftory, and of feveral ufeful and valuable works, to be printed at his own expence.

It was not, however, to be expected, that the new experiments and phyfical difcoveries with refpect to air, and the means of human conveyance through it, fhould have yet reached that capital, which had to long been wrapped in the feemingly impenetrable gloom of indolence and ignorance, and where a ftupid pride shut out the means of information, and feemed even to feal up the fources of curiofity. It was as little to be expected, that whenever fuch knowledge was communicated, or its effect difplayed, the artift or adventurer should not have been a native of the Weftern world.

But, contrary to all fpeculation on that fubject, a Perfian phyfician had the honour to be the first aeronaut, who not only attempted but fuccefsfully accomplished the purpole of afcending into the regions of the clouds at Constantinople. Though this Eastern philosopher, undoubtedly, derived his knowledge from the numberless experiments made in France and England, yet, confidering the frequent failures which occurred in both, and the great expence which conftantly attends these projects, the facility with which he conftructed and filled with gas, or air, a balloon of great fize, without subscription or support of any kind, is not a little furprizing. His ingenuity and courage were, however, amply rewarded in the event. In the prefence of the grand fignior and his principal officers, he, accompanied with two gentlemen of the court, alcended into the air from the grand terrace, which had been elegantly decorated for They had previoufly the purpose. paid their refpects perfonally to the fultan, who prefented each of them with a rich pelice, which they triumphantly wore in the afcent. Nothing could be more flattering to the aeronauts, or more magnificent, than the fight which they had to contemplate; all the inhabitants of that imperial city gazing and loft in admiration, and the forbidden beautiful gardens of the feraglio open to view, and filled with the fultanas and ladies in their richeft habits. They paffed over into Afia, and came profperoufly to ground at about 30 leagues diftance from the capital, after furveying one of the most beautiful and most delightful countries in the universe. After a knowledge of the terrors which the fight of balloons have impreffed on the minds of the people in the philofophical countries of England and France, we may form fome idea of the effect which this produced on the the Afiatic fide of the Hellespont, at fuch a diftance from the capital. But the Mahometans were ftruck with peculiar and inexpreffible dread and horror, under the supposition that their prophet was coming to take vengeance for their manifold offences. In this terror they proftrated themfelves every where upon the earth; and it was with the utmost difficulty that the aeronauts could fo far undeceive a few of the most fensible and courageous, as to procure affiltance for fecuring the balloon. The aeronauts were treated with the greatest marks of diftinction and honour upon their return to court, and most nobly rewarded, particularly the Perfian phyfician, by the grand fignior; who likewife ordered the balloon to be hung up in the church of St. Sophia as a perpetual memorial of fo wonderful an event.

At the fame time that this adventure excited fo much pleafure, and was fo amply rewarded at Constantinople, such is the difference of tafte and opinion, that the proffered exertions of one of the most eminent aerial voyagers were rejected by the emperor of Germany and the Pruffian monarch; and all attempts of the kind were abfolutely forbidden by the empress of Ruffia in any part of her dominions. The refufal of thefe great princes was founded on the inutility of the difcovery, and the fatal confequences to which these voyages were liable, and with which they had already The great expence been attended. which they occafioned, and the lofs of time and idlenefs which they excited among the people, were undoubtedly, though not fpecified, among the operating caufes of rejection with these prudent princes.

In the beginning of the year 1784, an unexpected ministerial revolution took place in Denmark. It was not, however, attended with any other confequences, than that of a reform or change in the councils and government of that king. The queen dowager, who is dom. a prince's of the houfe of Brunfwick Wolfenbuttle, and who in common with her family is posseffed of no fmall fhare of fpirit and ability, is almost necessarily fond of power, and flrongly addified to state intrigue. Her being a fecond wife, perhaps, enabled her to acquire the greater degree of influence in the late reign, and other circumftances afforded her an opportunity not only of retaining but increasing it in the prefent. This fondnefs for power, and the jealoufy atttendant on it, were generally fuppofed to have operated principally in producing that fatal revolution, in which the late unfortunate queen Carolina Matilda was the chief victim, but in which two of the ruling minifters and favourites perished, under circumstances of such inhuman cruelty, as struck all Europe with horror. The nation has fince been funk in a degrading state of apathy, and feemed almost entirely to have loft its rank in the effimation and confideration of the other powers of Europe.

That bloody catalpophe ferved to effablish the power of the queen dowager beyond all controul, and beyond the probability of its being shaken. She had filled the great offices of state with her adherents and favourites; and the infant fon of the unhappy Matilda being little thought of, and the probabilities against his life at that tender age being considerable, her fon prince

Frederic (the king's half brother) who was already arrived at manhood, was looked up to as the prefumptive fucceffor to the throne: fo that all things feemed to concur in fecuring her influence and authority for life; as they feemed firmly fixed for the prefent, and they could not be expected to fuffer any diminution under the future government of an only fon, brought up under her own tuition and maxims.

But time, which. though the great deftrover, is likewife the great renovator of all fublunary things, was preparing to throw a fudden cloud over all these bright and flattering prospects. The late infant prince royal was approaching fait to maturity, and befides those pleasing embellishments incident to the vigour of youth and a good conflictution, afforded indications of other qualities which, though highly grateful to the people at large, were particularly flattering to the hopes of the friends and partizans of his mother; and that defcription including all those who had either fusfered themfelves through the confequences of the late revolution, or who refeated the injuries of their friends who had, together with all fuch who were diffatisfied, upon whatever account, with the prefent conduct of public affairs, the party could not but be numerous.

Jan. 1784. Upon the opening of his 17th year, the prince appeared with fuch uncommonly early accomplifhments, and difplayed fuch forward and manly talents and abilities, that he became the hope and darling object of the nation. We are not fufficiently mafters of the fubject, to be able to give any detail of the previous meafures which he purfued for the overthrow of the junto, who, under the name of the cabinet, or council of flate, were the oftenfible directors of the affairs of the kingdom; the event, however, fhews, that he derived every benefit from his own popularity, and from the odium under which the ruling powers laboured on account of the fate of his mother, for the accomplifument of his purpofe; and it is evident that his measures were judicious, and his councils (from whatever quarter derived) prudent and wife. That darknefs which ever prevails in defpotic courts renders us equally incapable of determining whether the king took a previous, or any active fhare in the bufinefs; or wliether he only gave a fanction and confirmation to what was already done.

However thefe things April 14th. were, the first great point publicly attained by the prince was his being declared major, and his taking his place at the head of the council-board accordingly. This was the immediate prelude to the diffolution of the junto, who feemed to have no intimation of their approaching fate, until they were informed by the prince, that the king his father had no farther occasion for their fervices. At the fame time all the public departments received notice, that they were not to acknowledge or obey any orders from the late cabinet; and an ordinance was immediately published, that no orders from the council of ftate were in future to be received or confidered as valid, which had not been previoufly reported to the king, figned by him, and counterfigned by the prince royal. This was followed by the late minifters, the

The prince was immediately appointed prefident of the new council, which was composed of his uncle prince Frederic, and five or fix of the newly-appointed great officers of flate.

No revolution of the fort, under fuch a government, affecting a party fo long and fo firmly rooted in power, and fupported by fuch great interests, was ever accomplished with greater facility; nor has the temper, moderation, and wildom, which prefided in the whole conduct of the business, been often equalled. No other marks of reprobation or refertment were experienced by the members of the late cabinet, than the mere deprivation of their power, and lofs of their places: the fmallest harshness, or remembrance of past injury, did not appear in any part of the pro-This conduct will apceedings. pear the more exemplary and wife, to those who recolled the unequalled cruelties which stained the preceding revolution, and who confider the bitterness of spirit which their remembrance could not ftill but inevitably excite.

The fame moderation and wifdom prevailed in every thing. The queen dowager, as tome confolation for that difappointment which her ambition fuffered, and for that lofs of marked power, which holds out fuch irrefiftible charms to her fex and time of life, was gratified by the princely donation from the king, of the fuperb caffle of Fredericfburgh, in the duchy of Holftein, with the extensive demesnes, estates, and royalties appertaining to it; and, to render this free gift the more pleasing and complete, it was granted in perpetuity, with full authority to the queen to transfer, fell, or dispose of it by bequest, in whatever manner the might think proper. Similar large poffessions, with the fame unlimited rights, were conferred upon prince Frederic, whole conduct through all the patt transactions had been to blameles, that even his being the inftrument or object of another's ambition could not throw the fmalleft degree of imputation upon his character. The queen dowager retired to her caftle in Holftein, and the moft perfect tranquillity prevailed and continued throughout the kingdom.

The prince royal of Denmark has had the happy fortune, inftead of diminishing the early hopes that were formed of him, or lofing any part of the estimation in which he was held, to confirm and increase both in a very high degree. Befides his unufual attention and application to public bufinefs, he thews a most laudable disposition to letters, and is become the patron of learned men, and of literature. Inflead of wafting his time in the amufements and fports incident to his time of life and condition, he is already creeting an indelible monument to his fame, by becoming the reflorer of the learning, history, and antiquities of his country.

country. The early hiftory of the Northern nations has been buried in the deepeft darknefs, which has likewife ferved to involve that of a great part of Europe in much obfcurity. Yet fuch a fhare of learning as was equal to the prefervation, in fome form or degree, of the traditions and monuments of antiquity, prevailed in feveral parts of the North, which now retain no veftiges of their ever poffetting any fuch light ; and late difcoveries fhew, that it was extended even to remote parts of Ruffia. But Iceland, which was first the great and last depository of the old Runic learning, fables, and mythology, became fuddenly the great luminary of the North, with respect to the new Christian literature. Iceland foon funk, under the preffure of calamity and the gloom of ignorance, into nearly a forgetfulnefs of its paft ftate; while the labours of its bards and fages, with the still more early remains of antiquity, were buried in obscurity.

The prince has most liberally applied a confiderable fhare of his perfonal income or revenue to the recovery and developement of this antient lore. For this purpose he has employed learned men and judicious antiquaries to examine the public archives and private depofitories in Denmark and Norway, including the royal libraries and mufeums, for every thing that could tend to throw light upon the objects which they had in view. The long-forgotten repolitories of Iceland were fcrutinized in the fame manner; and the remains of antiquity, in profe and verfe, have been retrieved from dust and ashes, once more to behold the light. The refult of this fearch has been highly favourable and flattering to its authors. The most valuable discoveries are faid to have been made : and it is farther faid, that great ability, judgment, and industry, are ufed in felecting, collating, and preparing for the prefs, those parts which appear deferving of publication. From fome detached parts or fragments of them which have already appeared, it may be expected that they will throw no fmall light upon the early hillory of thefe kingdoms, at least upon that of the northern parts of Great Britain, of Ireland, and of the numerous illands appertaining to Scotland. It is not impoflible, nor even improbable, confidering the long depredations of the Danes in these countries, but that fome valuable records or monuments, of which no memorial is exifting at home, may be difcovered in these researches.

It may not be thought improper to turn our eyes for a moment from the contemplation of political revolutions to those great events of nature which feem to have marked the prefent time. They are equally interesting to all nations, as they affect the concerns we hold in common, and strike the imagination with the greatest force, because in those calamities which we inflict upon each other the power as well as the feebleness of man is difplayed, and his fufferings feem alleviated by the gratification of his vanity: but in those which proceed from natural caufes, we are entirely impotent and paffive; we bow down, and recognize the imbecility of our condition.

A fucceffion of fevere, irregular, and what are deemed unnatural feafons, attended with many violent fhocks of the earth, and extraordinary commotions in the heavens, have, have, for fome years, grievoully afflicted mankind in various parts of the world, and in every quarter of the globe. The defolation occafioned by earthquakes was not confined to Calabria or to Europe. Few great portions of the earth, from Formofa in the East, to Santa Fé and Mexico in the West, have efcaped being injured or alarmed by these awful concussions of nature. In the fame manner, tempests, hurricanes, tornadoes, attended with their usual concomitant, violent irruptions, and fatal inundations of the fea, have more or lefs fwept the feas, and defolated the coafts, nearly in all countries and climates: those of the East, and of the West Indies, at all times liable to their influence, have now experienced their fury in a degree before unknown.

That other great fcourge and deftroyer of mankind, the pestilence, has defolated, with unequalled malignity, those countries which, from whatever cause, seem to lie more peculiarly within the fphere of its action. From the Atlantic borders of Morocco to the extremities of Egypt, and from Paleftine to the mouth of the Euxine, the African and Afiatic coails of the Mediterranean, with those of Thrace on the European fide, the cruelty of its ravages has been more fevere, and the destruction of mankind greater, than at any period within the reach of memory, or perhaps within the records of hiltory.

Europe has likewife had its fhare of those evils, which no wisdom can foresee, no art or force prevent. Through a succession of such untoward seafons as we have mentioned; from the summer's partaking of the nature of winter; from the winters being without example in their feverity; from defiructive tempefts, violent and untimely rains and fnows, long droughts, and exceffive heats; and, to fum up all, from an excefs and irregularity in the ufual operations of nature, the labours and hopes of the hufbandman have been frequently fruthrated, and a very great failure of the fruits and products of the earth has very generally taken place.

To increase these calamities, some of the fineft parts of Germany, Hungary, Italy, and France, where the fertility of the foil, or the height of cultivation, seemed in some fort to bid defiance to the afperity of the feafons, have been detolated by the repeated and untimely inundations of their great rivers; which, having frequently taken place in the fummer and autumn, were the more fatally destructive in their effect. lt was upon one of these afflicting occafions, that the illustrious prince Leopold of Brunfwick, became a victim to his humane and heroic endeavour (on the 27th of April 1785) to fave the lives of a distracted mother's children, who were enclosed by the flill-increasing waters of the Oder, and on the point of perifhing before her eyes. The prince, partly perhaps as a rebuke to the cowardline's of the peafants, but more through the generofity of his nature, put off in a small boat to their affistance, which being driven by the violence of the current against the flump of an overthrown tree, it was unhappily flaved and overfet.— Poland and Lithuania, bowed down as they already were under the weight of their moral and political evils, were likewife doomed to bear their proportion of these physical calamities; nor did Pruffia (now only.

only their neighbour) efcape any better. -

It was estimated that Germany alone loft a million of theep by the inundations, and by the confequent want of food, and diftempers which they produced; the lofs in cattle was proportional. The most fertile countries in Europe, and those which had been wont to relieve the neceffities of others, being thus reduced to penury by the failure or deftruction of their harvefts, it is no wonder that the frozen and sterile regions of the North fhould now experience the greatest distress. Their winters for three or four years had been fevere beyond all known example. The extremity of the cold was infupportable to man and beatt. The most fertile provinces of Ruffia. and even Livonia itfelf (the plenteous granary of the North) failed of producing their accullomed harvefts. This afforded either caufe or pretence to the court of Peterfburgh, (for it is fuppofed that political fufpicion or jealoufy operated at leaft equally) to withhold the ftipulated fupplies of corn from Livonia to Sweden, which fhe was by treaty bound to permit the exportation of. By this means Sweden was reduced to the greateft diffrefs, and her northern provinces particularly fuffered every degree of calamity.

The Danish islands would have been abundantly supplied by their German provinces, if other wants, much more extensive than their own, had not demanded immediate supplies. The great kingdom of Norway had for fome years laboured under almost every degree of natural evil which the irregularity or violence of feasons could inflict. Nearly all the reforees of fustenance and means of supporting life were cut off, at the very time that the extremity of the cold rendered a more than ufual fupply neceffary to its prefervation : even the prolific northern feas refused their tribute of fish, a supply which had ever before appeared inexhauftible. Government did every thing in its power to affift a nation which forms its principal ftrength; but the country was too extensive, and the demands too vait, for any foreign fupply. The confequences were dreadful: many thousands perished through abfolute famine; and a much greater number through the fatal diforders which it produces.

But the heavy portion of calamity allotted to the unhappy country of Iceland, befides being fingular in its nature, feemed in the amount to exceed that of any other. That fequestered island, once the feat of the northern mufes, had been before defolated by a dreadful peftilence, which in the 14th century fwept all the regions of the north, but had been particularly fatal here. It never recovered in any respect the effects of that fhock, nor in any degree its former flate of population. Its paftoral inhabitants, being in a great measure fecured by poverty and diftance from rapine and oppreflion, and ignorant of the artificial wants which alternately fweeten and embitter human life in more genial climates, were contented and happy under all the rigours of their inclement skies, and found in their flocks, herds, and fiftheries, a compenfation for the flerility of their country with respect to corn.

But they had been at all times exposed to a dreadful internal enemy, whose rage was as irressible, as its operations were uncertain and unlimited. Mount Hecla, and the other other volcanoes which fo much diftinguish that island, although, perhaps, they promote the purposes of vegetation, by communicating a genial warmth to its frozen bolom, have at all times been the terror, and at particular periods the fcourge and destroyers, of the inhabitants.

The calamity, however, in the present instance, was of a nature hitherto without example. Inflead of the open defolation common to the aweful eruptions of volcanoes, the country itfelf, together with its products, were now confumed by a creeping fubterraneous fire. This deftroyer of nature in its fource, made its first appearance in the month of June 1784, in the western part of the district of Skaptfield, and on a mountain called Skapton Gluver. The devouring fire, which confumed, or reduced to cinders, every thing in its way, continued burning until the month of May in the following year, having in that time extended its devaltation about twenty leagues in length, and from four to five in breadth. The great river Skaptage, which was from feven to eight fathoms in depth, and fome leagues in breadth, was entirely dried up, its bed and channel prefenting a dreadful yawning chafm. About a fourth part of the confumed foil confified of a lava of great aatiquity, and of moffy bogs or marthes; the remains of the burnt earth refembled vaft heaps of calcined ftones, and were of the colour of vitriol.

A fimilar fire broke out about the fame time on the eattern fide of the fame range of mountains, and purfued its courfe in the opposite direction. This made its first appearance in a place which feemed the leaft capable of any of exhibiting fuch a phænomenon; it broke out in the very channel of another great viver called the Herervifiodt, which was nearly of the fame depth with the Skaptage, but, in that part, not above a league in breadth. The contention between the two elements, however violent, did not continue long, the waters being foon loft in the faperior magnitude and force of the outrageous flames. This fire was far more dreadful than that on the western fide, the flames foon after their first appearance forming an area of about ten leagues in extent. At first they darted perpendicularly upwards, and feemed to proceed from the lower regions of the earth, but afterwards they rolled along the furface, in waves refembling those of the sea; and when they reached the frozen mountains, whole bowels were impregnated with immenfe quantities of fulphur and nitre, these powerful materials endued them with such activity, that nothing could eleape any more than withftand their fury. Cattle, men, houles, villages, every thing living and dead was confumed in a moment. We are not furnished with any precife account, either of the extent of this ravage, or of the time ef its continuance; it being only given in general terms, that leventeen diffricts had been entirely ruined; but whether this proceeded. from the immediate action, or when ther it includes the confequent er. fects of the conflagration, is left unipecified.

The former was, however, hap-pily limited in its progress; but its permicious effects were widely diffuled, and afflicted in different de-, grees the greater part, if not the whole, of that very extensive itland. For

For that country abounding with fulphur beyond any other perhaps in the known world, and the earth being likewife impregnated with various other minerals in a prodigious degree, the exhalations caufed by these vehement conflagrations was in the highest degree noxious to every thing possessing animal or vegetable life. Nor was this all ;-but the ashes and cinders, being conveyed to prodigious distances by the winds, and being little lefs noxious than the vapours, deftroyed or contaminated the herbage wherever they fell. And the country producing but little corn, but affording a profusion of herbage, the people in the inland parts depended almost entirely upon the produce of their numerous flocks and herds for fustenance. But this resource was now almost entirely cut off, for such of the cattle as escaped being poifoned or starved during the fummer, either perifhed through the want of hay in the enfuing long winter, or died of the contagious distempers caufed by noxious aliment and effluvia. On the other hand, fish, whether fresh or dry, formed a principal part of the food of the people near the coafts, befides a large fupply for the inland parts, and fufficient to barter for corn and other foreign neceffaries. But as misfortunes feldom come fingle, the fifheries failed of their bounty in a degree never before known; and the length and feverity of the enfuing winter was unexampled even under their polar fkies.

It was estimated that five-fixths of the cattle, and three-fourths of the sheep, in the whole island perished; and, as many parts were out of the reach of the conflagrations, or of their apparent effects, it may from thence be judged how complete the destruction was within their immediate influence. The people adjacent to the trading towns on the coafts were relieved in fome degree from the preffure of the general calamity, through the bounty which Denmark could ill afford to beftow, under the great and general penury which prevailed at home, and the famine which at the fame time was raging in Norway. But those in the interior parts were cut off from all help, for their horfes having perified, they were deprived of the means of drawing fupplies from the coalts, if they had even poffeffed those of purchasing them. Thus their condition was deplorable in the extreme. Befides the loffes occaffoned by famine and diftempers, great numbers have fince abandoned those houses and farms which their anceftors had poffeffed from time immemorial, through the impoffibility of replacing their flocks of cattle. It would feem that this ftroke would in a great meafure prove conclusive with respect to the future definy of this very unfortunate island; at least fo far as relates to its interior culture and habitation. It had in no degree recovered the deftruction of the 14th century. Before that fatal period, it is faid to have been very populous, and was held in no fmall effimation by the nations of the North on account of its learning. The people are likewife faid to have possessed at that time a portion of happinefs beyond what could have been expected from their climate and fituation; but to which the innocency of their paftoral lives feemed to afford no fmall claim.

Neither the danger of foreign war, nor the refignation of the duke of Brunfwick, ferve in any degree to allay the ferment in Holland, or to reftore tranquillity to the Stadtholder's government. Great point gained by the adverse party, in procuring a French General to command the armies of the Republic. Some account of the Marshal de Maillebois. Short view of the origin and hiftory of that celebrated republican party, which has fubfifted in Holland from the days of Prince Maurice to the prefint time. Motives on both fides for the close connection which generally subfified between that party and France. Late war with England, and its confequences, afforded the means for that party to become again formidable. General charges against the Stadthelder with respect to the conduct of that avar, and the anjavers made to them. Repeatedly challenges them to the proof. Their views answered by supporting and spreading the clamour and jealoufy. Specific enquiry into the conduct of the narry, after a long and tedious course of proceeding, produces nothing equal to the public expectation. Various causes which concurred at this time to raise the republican spirit to the highest pitch in that country. Injudicious measure of placing arms in the hands of the burghers, produces effects little expetied or wijhed by the leaders of the party, and caufes great innovations in the government of many towns. Peculiar advantages poffeffed by the adverse party over those on the Orange side. Great legal, official, and natural powers, and rejources, possessing the Prince Stadtholder. Violent measure of deposing the Prince from the government of the Hague. Prince and family aban-don the Hague. Ineffectual interposition of the late King of Prussia. Judicious measure of the Prince Stadtbolder in vetiring to Guelderland. A/femblage of the States of Holland and West Friezeland at the Hague. Rioz on opening the Stadtholder's gate. Violent diffensions and great preparations for defence or war, in the city of Utrecht. Large subscriptions for supporting the armed burghers and volunteers. Republic convulped in all its parts. Great debates in the affembly of the States of Holland and Weft Friezeland, on the question for restoring the Stadtholder to the government of the Hague. Question lost by a fingle vote. Spirited letter, immediately upon his accesfion, from the prefent King of Pruffia in behalf of the Stadtholder, conweyed by his minister of state, the Buron de Goerts. Little effect produced by the King's representations. Memorial from the Court of Versuilles, not only difclaiming all interference berfelf in the government of the republic, but declaring her intention to prevent their being diffurbed by that of others. Refractory burghers of Elbourg and Hattem reduced by the Stadsholder, under the orders of the States of Guelderland. Viclent ferment on the taking of thefe towns. States of Holland Jupend the Stadtholder from all the functions appertaining to his office of Coptain General within their province; and dijcharge the troops from their military oath to obey his orders.

HE spirit raifed in Holland againit the houle of Orange by the French or republican party, which in this respect were the fame, was too violent to be laid by conceffion. The redgnation of the duke Lewis of Bruniwick, and his total dereliction of the country, inftead of contributing, as was hoped, to allay the ferment, by removing the supposed object of uneafinefs and jealoufy, produced effects directly contrary. This intended measure of conciliation, being confidered merely as the effect of irrefolution and weaknets, was regarded and treated accordingly. It ferved to fink the political character of the stadtholder still lower in the eftimation of the republican party; and as it rendered them more fenfible of their power, to extend their views, and make them more ardent and confident in the profecution of their defigns ; while that prince, being left exposed, without any intervening medium, to the florm, became perfonally fubject to their obloquy and invective, and the immediate object of all their attacks.

The fucceeding imminent danger from without to which the ftate was exposed by the contest with the emperor, it was well to be prefumed would in this inflance (as foreign danger generally does in fimilar cafes) have proved the means of healing internal diffension, and of reftoring the executive power to its due fliare of weight and confideration. In defiance of all speculation and experience, this circumstance, through fome peculiar infelicity, produced effects the direct reverse of those which were to be expected. The immediate danger, indeed, produced fome temporary cullation of the violence against the fladtholder; but its confequences were exceedingly detrimental to his interefts, and ferved no lefs to exalt and to ftrengthen his adverfaries both in power and in number. For the terrers of a most perilous invafion fucceeding clofely upon the lois of the duke of Bruniwick's military experience and ability, the immediate prefervation of the country feemed to depend upon the procuring of a commander well verfed in war, to fupply his place. This circumftance threw the game entirely into the hands of the adverse faction, and procured them an opportunity which of all others they most wished, and had least expected, that of placing the military force of the republic in the hands of a French general.

The military abilities of the marfhal de Maillebois, who was appointed to this important command, were too well known to admit of any objection against him on that account; and that peculiar fpirit of intrigue, and turbulence of difpofition, which had drawn fo long a courfe of degradation and fuffering upon him through a great part of his life, were probably not confidered as detracting from his eligibility for this fervice. His oftenfible command, being fubordinate to that of the fladtholder as captain general, and only fupplying the place of the duke of Bruniwick, feemed to afford no room for uneafinefs or jealoufy; but the party who brought him in, confidered themfelves as having far advanced by this meafure towards attaining the fummit of their wifnes. Whatever the fortune of the war might he, they were well aware that they had.

had obtained a general, who from Fis natural character, national policy, and other concurrent circuinflances, would not fail to go all the lengths they could with with them upon the return of peace; and they would deem it their own fault, if they did not fortify his power fo ftrongly in the army, as to render him by degrees independent of the captain general.

The conclusion of the contest with the emperor, and the circumstances with which it was accompanied, were ftill more favourable to the views of that party than its commencement or progrefs. The diffinguished part which the court of Versailles had taken in procuring if not forcing that accommodation, was fo fignal an obligation and fervice, the valuc being estimated by the greatness of the apprehenfion, as well as of the danger which it removed, that no limits could be preferibed to the gratitude which it excited in all or ders, parties, and degrees of the people. This of courfe threw into the hands of France (independent of the vast influence which fne derived from the late war) nearly an unbounded fway, not only in the collective councils of the flate, but in its numberless component parts, where every province was an independent fovereign, and every city a diffinct republic.

Much, however, would have been ftill wanting to confirm the ftrength, and to complete the views of the republican party, if it had not been for that fingular treaty of alliance between Holland and France, which accompanied, or feemed rather to grow out of the contest with the emperor. That alliance, which feemed rather founded upon the principle of confolidating two nations into one, under the fame common fovereign, than upon ideas of parity, mutual convenience and fecurity, between independent states, endued France with fuch powers, and afforded her fuch rights or pretences for intermeddling in the internal as well as external affairs of the republic, that the most inconfiderable party muß have become dominant under her countenance ; while the fladtholder, without any direct invation of his rights, mult have dwindled into a cypher, and the leffer country, in the ufual courfe of things, must, without fome extraordinary interruption, have gradually become, either actually or virtually, a province to the greater.

It may be necessary here to premile, fomewhat more fully than we have heretofore done, what the caufes were of that coincidence of views which fubfifted between France and the antiftadtholderian faction in Holland.

For this purpose it will be fufficient barely to observe, upon a subjeft generally known, that William the first of Orange, with the princes his brothers, had laid and cemented with their blood the foundations of that republic. The cruel and treacherous affailination of the former happened just at the time when the flates of the country were upon the point of establishing in his perfon, and rendering hereditary in his family, fuch a limited fovercignty, as had been held by their ancient counts, and was afterwards transferred by marriage to the princes of the house of Burgundy. The nonage of his fon, and fucceffor in the fladtholderfhip, the celebrated prince Maurice, prevented his being able to profit of the occafion while it laded : and it could never be recovered. It is [E]well well known that in the long and arduous wars which involved the greateft part of his life, and in which he became the first captain of the age, he not only established the independence of the republic, but carried its power and splendour to a height which aftonished all the world.

It was natural that Maurice and his fucceffors fhould look back with regret to that fovereignty, which had been fo nearly obtained, and fo unfortunately miffed in the first inftance; and that they should endeavour to enlarge their official powers as stadtholders to the utmost extent. Nor was it lefs natural that the potent citizens, who had grown up, along with the fortune of the republic, to great power and immense wealth, should not only oppose their defigns, but that they should endeavour by all means to circumscribe a power, which they confidered as becoming dangerous to public liberty, and inimical to the principles of the conflictution. The bitternels of fuch a contest foon effaced all memory of the fervices which the flate had received from the Orange family, in the minds of those who had been deeply engaged in the opposition, or who had fuffered from the part which they had taken. Great generals feemed no longer neceffary in a feafon of peace and prosperity, nor did it follow, becaufe it had hitherto fo proved, that every prince was to be a great general. The party accordingly extended their views to the total abolition of the office of fladtholder, and to a distribution of its various powers amongst their own leaders.

Such was the origin and foundawon of that celebrated republican party, which holds fo fplendid a share in the hiftory of Holland; which has produced men of the firf: eminence for patriotifm and ability; and which, under various denominations, has fubfilted from the days of prince Maurice and Barnaveldt to the prefent time.

It has been the conftant and the obvious policy of France, to maintain her influence in the councils of Holland, and, at the fame time, to reftrain or weaken as much as poffible the power and political activity of the republic. The princes of the house of Orange were generally inimical to the views of France, and linked by blood and alliance with powers who acted upon principles diametrically oppofite to her politics. This state of things occafioned a standing ensity on her fide against the house of Orange; and their views entirely coinciding in that refpect, naturally produced an intimate connection between her and the republican party.

This policy was accordingly steadily purfued, and her interest with that powerful party diligently cultivated by France, excepting only in that fingle inflance, when the pride and vanity of Louis XIV, co-operating with his immenfe power, led him to difdain all motives of prudence, and all bonds of political amity, and impelled him to the wanton attack which he made upon the united provinces in the year 1672. The party of which we treat, under the aufpices of the celebrated De Witt, was then in the zenith of its power, having fucceeded in totally abolithing the fladtholderate, and having for feveral years conducted the affairs of the republic with uncommon abilities, fplendour, and fuccels : but that unexpected and violent irruption occanoned its total degradation and and ruin. The fladtholderate was reflored; and that great flatefman and patriot De Witt, (whofe only fault was his placing too much confidence in the faith of France) together with his brother, fcarcely lefs eminent, became miferable facrifices to the fury of a cruel rabble.

The fladtholderate became exting by the death of William the Third of England, the states not thinking proper to renew it in favour of that part of his family who had fucceeded to the title of Orange, as well as to the principal part of his inheritance. Another French war, and another invation, produced a fecond revolution in the government of the republic. In the year 1748, the office was renewed in its full plenitude of power, in favour of the late Prince of Orange, father of the prefent, with the great additional fecurity of being rendered hereditary, not only in the male, but the female lines of his family.

It would feem that as this fettlement went to cut off entirely the views of the adverfe party, fo it could no longer have any ground of exiftence, or at leaft, that if it was at all held up, it could have no other objects, than those of watching with a fuspicious and jealous eye the conduct of future ftadtholders, of being in conftant readinefs to refift any extension of their power, or to counteract any measures which might appear capable in their confequences of becoming dangerous to public liberty.

Such was probably for many years the flate of this party. But though depressed, or at least withheld from any means of political exertion, they were still potent and numerous, and only waited for fome favourable opportunity which fhould operate as a fignal for union and exertion. In the mean time, France had long feen and lamented the miferable policy of Louis XIV. and even in their most depressed and hopeless state, had omitted no pains to renew her connections and recover her intereft with the leaders of the party. A long minority, and a fucceeding administration of affairs, which, if not abfolutely weak, was not much diffinguished by vigour, nor much bleft with popularity, could not but prove favourable, either to the nurfing of a new, or the renovating of an old party : and this accordingly began to life up its head, and to become confpicuous and troublefome.

It would, however, have been fill but little confidered, if the late unfortunate war with England, and its ruinous confequences, having fhaken the republic to its foundations, and occationed a departure from many of its antient maxims and principles, had not likewife made way for the growth of this party, and called all its powers into action. The fladtholder's known averfencis to any political connection with France, and above all to the entering into any treaty with, or affording any support to the American colonies, which were then in a flate of open rebellion against the mother country, together with his near relation in blood to the British fovereign, and supposed strong predilection for his interests, ferved all together, even from the beginning, to afford ample room for fuspicion, that he could not engage very heartily in a caufe which went fo directly against opinions in which he had been nurtured.

Such fufpicions would have eafily  $[E]_2$  died died away, and been foon forgötten, had the war been attended with fuccefs. But when it produced nothing but the most difgraceful and ruineus confequences, and the republic feemed irrecoverably funk in point of effimation and character, it was no difficult transition in the temper incident to fo grievous a lituation, to convert fufpicion into cenfure, and jealoufy into charge and accufation. The faction adverfe to the iladtholder, led by Van Berkel, the rentionary of Holland, had been themselves the abettors of that war which, whether it was brought on by the unreafonable expectations of the one, or the infidelity of the other, was equally inconfiftent with the true policy of both nations. By a fort of ingular fortune, the heavieit ftrokes of the war fell principally upon the republicans. The rich merchants of Amsterdam, Rotterdam, and other great towns of Holland, who might be confidered as the finews of that party, having fuftained the deepeft loffes by the capture of St. Euflatia, with the other fevere blows, as well on the feas as in both the Indies, which the republic had received during that Ill-fought and unfortunate conflict.

It is common with those who are feverely fmarting under adversity, by calling the blame of particular evils upon others, to endeavour to divert their minds from an examination and a possible condemnation of the general line of their own conduct. It was likewise no imall confolation, that these circumstances of public and private misfortune, might be converted into an engine of offence against their political adversary; with the farther, but inviting hope, that by proper management they might afford the means of his degradation from office and power. Upon thefe principles, and perhaps upon opinion, however founded, the accidents of the war were attributed to the prince stadtholder, whole foreign connections, it was held out, had warped him to interefts and principles diftinet from, and even adverse to, those of the republic. Many others who had been fufferers by the war, as well as the members of the adverfe party, glad to find fome object on which to vent their discontents, adopted and promulgated the fame opinion. It was befides a kind of refource to national vanity, and particularly to those who felt most for the reputation and honour of their country, to attribute her difgraces rather to perfonal mifconduct than to verhaps the real caufes which, waving the impolicy of the late war, were to be found in the declenfion and weaknefs, into which a long courfe of indolence and negligence had relaxed the bleffings of fecurity and peace, in that felfish and difforted policy a nation eafily contracts when its views are no longer carried beyond itfeld, when great interefts ceafe to be agitated, and great occasions ceafe to call forth great men. This flate of things, as it made a fort of excufe for ill fuccefs, was no farther allowed by the republican party, than as they could impute it to the introduction of a monarchical principle into a fmall commercial flate, which, being narrow in its extent, and poor in natural refources, could, as they afferted, flourish only when the fpirit of liberty gave the fulles operation to indultry and genius. That great countries had been often known to profper under a monarchical form of government, but that 7 that in fmall flates, the dominion of one was always the forcrunner of imbecility and weaknefs.

Men who act together upon any public principle, or join in any common opinion, are apt to coalefce in other matters. Those who credited these reports to injurious to the stadtholder became profelytes to the party adverse to his power. The obloquy, which was first diffeminated with fome degree of caution, as it became more general was more publicly spoken; and as the clamour increased, so did the converts.

As the charges brought against the fladtholder were mofily general, they could only admit of general aniwers. It was faid that he had not exerted the force with which he was entrufted by the flate in that manner, or with that energy, which might have been done, and which would have been most effectual for counteracting the defigns, and fruftrating the efforts of the enemy; that the naval department had been fhamefully neglected; its force, fuch as it was, milapplied or withheld; and that to there caules only was to be imputed the ruin of their foreign commerce, and the lois of their colonies. On these points the prince in vain repeatedly challenged his adversaries to the enquiry and proof; which as they evaded, gave reafon to believe that they did not want to briag them to a decision, the event of which was uncertain, and which mult overlay their defigns if it proved in his favour ; that they only withed the fcandal to lie, and the public clamour to increase or continue. He urged that the weak flate and bad condition of their navy had rendered it totally incapable of performing the expected fervices; and that the blame on this fubject did not reft with him, but with the flates themfelves, to whom he had frequently remonitrated on the inattention flewn with refpect to that department, and as frequently warned them of the necefity, as they were purfuing meafures tending to a war, to be in dae preparation for withflanding its confequences.

One fpecific object of enquiry was, indeed, brought early forward, and it was upon a fubject which had made the deepest public imprefiion, and excited the greatest clamour : this was upon the fubject of the Dutch fleet's not proceeding to Breft, according to compact, in the year 1782, when the memorable fcheme had been formed, that the whole combined naval force of the house of Bourbon and of Holland thould have fallen at once upon the coafts of Great Britain (at a time when her flrength was difperfed in every quarter of the globe) and fwept every thing before it. The failure had been loudly attributed to criminal neglect, if not to treachery, and a committee was speedily appointed to enquire into the caufes. The extreme tedioumefs of the proceedings probably anfwered all the purpoles that were originally intended, in keeping the public attention and expectation awake, the popular clamour alive, and giving a colour to all other charges and furmites.

Nothing could exceed the public difappointment, when the refult of this flow inquifition was at length published. None of the great difcoveries that had been to long expected were made; nor any thing whatever that tended to affect the fladtholder. Some errors and mir- $[E]_3$  managements managements in the conduct of their marine, particularly with regard to the mode of victualing their fhips, and which had fubfifted from time immemorial, were now for the firft time detected; and fome naval officers received blame for not obeying the orders of the flates, and fulfilling the engagements with their allies, without regard to condition or circumflances.

Other concurring causes contributed at this time to render the party in queftion peculiarly powerful and numerous. The revolution in America, which feems to have given life to the feeds of liberty, in countries where it was leaft to be expected, could not fail to revive and increase the republican spirit, in a country diversified in fo many governments, and of fuch peculiar The numerous forms, as Holland. fest of the Mennonites, with the other numberless fectaries that abound fo much in that country, being generally levellers upon principle, were of course adverse to any thing that bore the most distant refemblance to regal power, in what. ever manner it might be bound or modified. Thefe people, being the great money-dealers of the country, had, in the courfe of near a century of peace, acquired immense wealth, which tended to itrengthen the characteristic of that order of men, extreme felfifhnefs, and an equal deficiency of public fpirit. Their wealth, however, necessarily produced a very extensive degree of power and influence, the nobility being particularly enthralled to them, either through perfonal debts or heavy mortgages on their estates.

The republican fpirit being once revived among the iectaries, infpired them with all the enthufiafra of their founders and ancestors. Enthufiafts are the moft troublefome as well as the most dangerous of all encmies, being unwearied in their attacks, implacable in their animofity, and their operations the more difficult to be foreseen and counteracted, as no rules of reafon or experience reach to measure the conduct of these who act without regard to any. These people became accordingly the most bitter and implacable of the fladtholder's enemies : while each feemed individually to confider him rather as a private enemy, from whom he had received fome inexpiable injury, than as a member of the flate with whom he differed upon public principles.

The measure of placing arms in the hands of the burghers, and of encouraging them to incorporate in military communities, for which the conteft with the emperor afforded a pretext, feems to have been adopted with very little confideration by the leaders of the faction, was pregnant with much difficulty and trouble to themfelves, and tended in its extent to the overthrow of all their defigns, and to the introduction of fuch innovations, both in the general and particular forms of government in that country, as they had little forefeen or intended

For the better comprehension of this part of the subject, it may be neceffary to observe some peculiarities in the political state of the country, which are not always adverted to. The people at large, in the various aristocratical republics, whose union is considered as forming one great commonwealth, have in fact no more share in the government government of their respective cominunities, than the fubjects of Venice, Ruffia, or Turkey; and the fovereignty, with refpect to them, is as fupreme as it is in those countries. This conflictution of government having fublifted from time immemorial, undoubtedly from the first institution of municipal communities in the country, was become fo habitual to the people, that they did not feem to think of any other, nor to feel any inconvenience in their condition;-an extraordinary acquiescence in a people effeemed fo jealous of their liberties, unless perhaps it be fupposed, that the manners of the people prevailed over the forms of the conflitution; and that the fpirit of republican equality, leaving those who were magistrates in power only vicious in appearance, avoided abufe of authority on one fide, and envy on the other. However that was, the ariftocracies in the feveral diffinct republics were fo far felfelective, as to be subject only to the controul of the fladtholder, who had a right of nomination or negative with respect to a small limited number of their choofing.

It is farther to be particularly observed, that no ideas of general liberty, or what may more properly be called of any extension of the administration of government to the people at large, appears to have been entertained, either by the prefent, or by any of the former parties in that country, who had the name of republican. Their tendency was to strengthen the aristocracies, by removing those checks which the stadtholder held upon their felfelection, and to place the general government in the hands of an oligarchy, composed of their own principal leaders, who would likewife be felfelective and perpetual; and who, from their not being subject to the jealoufy attendant on the government of a fingle perfon, would, in the nature of things, foon affume powers, and a decision of authority, which had never been possefied by the stadtholderate.

But when the rash and desperate measure of arming the multitude was adopted, it foon changed the face and nature of affairs, and produced effects as directly opposite to the wishes as to the intentions of those by whom it was framed. The people finding arms in their hands. began at once to feel their own importance; they awakened, as it were, from a dead fleep, and began to wonder why they held no fhare in that government which they were called upon to defend or fupport, and which it was evident could have no permanent fecurity without them. The examples of Ireland and America were fresh before them; the very term of volunteers, which they assumed, contributed to stamp the character of the part they were to act. The democratical spirit being thus fuddenly, and for the first time, brought to life, and feeling as it were the possession of its faculties. displayed all the vigour, and perhaps even the wantonnefs of youth.

The armed burghers had been intended as a counterpoize to the army, which was known to be generally attached to the fladtholder: and it was fondly expected, that when they had performed the fervice, they would have filently funk into their former infignificance. But when, without waiting for that iffue, they began to hold themfelves up as conflituent members of the commonwealth, and demanded to be admitted to a fhare in the legiflation and government of their refpective cities, by electing delegates who were to be received as their legal reprefentatives in the public aniemblies, and thus form a popular counterpoize to the arithogratic powcr, nothing could exceed the farprize and confiernation which they excited.

The ariftocracies were aghaft and confounded at pretensions, the polfibility of which they had never even thought of; nor were the principal leaders of the faction lefs difconcerted and alarmed; they faw they had improvidently raifed a dangerous fpirit, and brought a new power into action, without a due confideration of the force and excentricity of its movements; and that these were evidently beyond their controul or regulation. The intuation was indeed critical and dangerou -; for in they refuted to comply with the demands of the armed burghers, it was to be feared that they would change fides directly, and go over to the Orange party, by which the fludtholder would have been rendered to triamphantly powerful, that all oppofition mult be at an end, on the other hand, if the arithderacies granted their claims, they must be for ever cut off from all the fweets of authority, now grown habitual, and which, by the means of felfelection, they hoped to have rendered as nearly immortal as human inffitutions are capable of being.

In this dilemma, various means were adopted in various places, and much chicanery practiled, in order to flave off the evil hour, in the hope that fome fortunate interruption might prevent the queijon from being brought to an abfolate decifion, or at leaft, that the preffore of the prefent state of affairs might be eased before it was brought to an iffue; in which cafe, the powers of the law and of the flate being combined against the new pretenfions, the popular party would of neceflity be obliged to fubmit. In fome places, where the claims were too impetuouily urged, and the arithocracy too fliff to give way, the latter applied to the flates of the province for protection, who accordingly ordered the military force of the flate to reduce the armed burghers, and to reftore the ancient conflitution. This extremity was, however, only proceeded to in a few places. In the city of Utrecht, where the armed burghers amounted to feveral thousands, the popular fpirit was carried to its higheft extreme of violence; they not only fet the flates of the province at defiance, but taking the government of the city entirely into their own hands, and converting it into a place of arms, prepared for defence and open war, both againfi the provincial and general force of the state. In process of time, and after various tumults and thruggles, the arithocracies were obliged in many places, particularly feveral towns of Holland, to give way to the prevailing necessity, and to jubmit in fome degree to the claims of the popular party.

This was the only extension of public liberty which there diffentions have hitherto preduced; and this proceeded from circumfiance, accation, and final neceffity, and not from any previous defign or with.

The flates of Holland and Weft Friezeland were the great and confiant impagners of the fladtholder's authority authority and prerogatives. They assumed a superiority not admitted by the conflitution of the union, and derived only from the circumstances of the first-mentioned province poffeffing a greater thare of wealth, and a larger extent of territory, than any of the others; they paid but little regard or attention to the flates general in the meafures which they purfued, and the continual warfare, as it may be called, which they waged against him; acting upon these occasions rather as a supreme dictator, than as an equal and co-regent with the The most bitter other provinces. animofity which appeared against that prince, feemed to be peculiarly lodged in the province of Holland; and the city of Amilerdam took the lead of all other places in the invariable difplay of that enmity. The pride and wealth of that city, with its paramount influence in its own province, had at all times frequently induced both to affume an odious pre eminence over their fellows; and though this had been generally fubmitted to, yet when they have carried the fpirit of domination to a certain degree of excess, it has occasionally excited fuch a refentment in other provinces, as more than once feemed to threaten a diffolution of the union. Their influence cannot, however, but continue great, from the caufes we have mentioned.

It is easily seen, from the state of affairs which we have premised, that the adverse faction had many and great advantages over their adversaries of the Orange party in this contest. They were closely united, by having had for several years one common object in view, to which all their measures were directed ; while their antagonifts, having no object to attain which might ferve to unite their zeal, or excite their enterprize, were loofe, carelefs, and unconnected. The adverse party had likewife the unfpeakable advantage of being fupported by the monied men; they were befides quickened by the ardour, and kept in conftant exercise by the indefatigable zeal, and reftlefs fpirit, always obfervable in fectaries. And though the measure of arming the volunteers, had been productive of much trouble and diforder among themselves, yet it afforded them at least the benefits of a formidable appearance, and of a menacing afpect.

It was necessary that the prince fladtholder should not be weak or unguarded, to withftand fuch a combination of adverse interests, parties, and circumstances. He was indeed ftrongly fortified on all fides. He was armed with great legal rights, authorities, and powers, or which he could not be deprived at lefs expence than a total rupture and nearly fubverfion of the dyftem and conflitution of the republic; at the fame time that, during the courfe of the contest, they would have abundantly afforded him the means of their own prefervation and defence. In virtue of his offices of captain-general and admiral-general of the union, the whole military force of the republic by fea and land was in his poffession. This fovereign authority was confirmed and rendered more effective, by his having the fole differal of all military commissions, from those of the colonels to the enfigns inclusively; by the troops being bound in an oath of fidelity to him perfonally, as well as to the flates; and by the whole whole army being obliged to obey his commands implicitly in all mi-In the fpirit of the litary cafes. fame authority, he had the power of changing, leftening, or increafing garriions, of directing all the movements of the troops, of affembling the army, or any part of it, and of ordering it to march at will. He held a fimilar authority in the naval department; and all these great powers were confirmed and rendered more effective, by the firong general attachment both of the fleet and army to his perfon and interclts.

But his authority and legal powers were by no means confined to the fieet and army. By his office of fladtholder, he was placed as prefident at the head of most if not all of the civil departments of the state. He presided, either in perfon or by deputy, as he chofe, in all the affemblies of the feveral respective provinces. He had a feat, though not a vote, in the affembly of the flates general; and it was not merely a matter of right, but a part of his official duty, to be prefent at their deliberations, and to give his opinion or advice upon all matters of their deliberation, in which he deemed either necessary; and this had not only a great inflaence upon their proceedings, but in times of harmony, and under a vigorous and fuccefsful administration of public affairs, was generally decifive of their conduct. His right of nomination or rejection with respect to the new members appointed to fill up the town fenates and magistracies was now contested, and generally overruled, but could not fail to have given him by its past operation a great influence in those diffinct republics. In the quality of governor-general and supreme director of the East and West India companies, the stadtholder likewise had an unbounded influence in those great commercial bodics.

With these legal and official powers, he had a fuil moiety, at leaft, of the people at large either abfolutely attached to his intereffs, or fo far on his fide, that from their averiencies to all violent innovations in the conflitution and government, they were well disposed to the support of his authority. Even in the province of Holland, and in Amiterdam iticlf, the great feat and ftrong hold of his evenies, no calculator could determine on which fide the majority would appear, if the matters in difpute were to be decided by a general poll. The fame diverfity of party and opinion every where appeared. Nor was there a much greater concurrence in the ariftocracies themselves than among the people. Even in Amfterdam, Rotterdam, and the greater cities of Holland, which were those most peculiarly adverse to the stadtholder, the domineering party could only build upon majorities, nothing like unanimity being any where to be obtained. In the fmaller towns, the parties, in the government were generally more nearly upon an equality. With respect to the provincial states, those of Gaelderland and Utrecht were entirely on his fide ; those of the three other provinces fluctuating, and disposed to be mediatorial : to that those only of Holland and Weft Friezeland were abfolutely inimical to him. Yet, even in the affembly of the flates of Folland, the grand queftion relative to the government of the Hague, after being long and violently tently agitated, was only carried against him by a fingle vote. The equestrian order, or nobles, which may in some degree be compared with what is called in England the landed interest, were, in the province of Holland, as every where elfe, generally on the prince's fide. Their share in the government of that province is, however, but very small, as they hold only one voice in the assembly of the states, which confists of nineteen.

In fuch an effimate of the prince stadtholder's powers and resources, it fhould not be entirely overlooked, that he held in his own inherent right, as derived from his ancef. tors, very confiderable eftates and poffestions, including cities, castles, palaces, lordships, and marquifates, in various parts of the country, and that these, of old right, endued him with feveral important privileges and authorities, independent of his offices under the state. Nor should that great external refource be forgotten, which he poffeffed in the friendship and protection of the Pruffian monarch; a connection cemented by all the bands of policy, as well as by the ties of a near affinity : and which effectually shielded him from the apprehension of his adverfaries being ever fuffered to proceed beyond certain limited measures of violence against him.

The faction, however, found themfelves fo potent at home, and placed fo unbounded a confidence in the fupport of France, which they now confidered as the great palladium of the flate, as well as of the party, that they paid lefs attention to the admonitions of the great Frederic, than a well-advifed policy would at any time have admitted; and without even waiting for the absolute conclusion of the negociations with the emperor at Paris, proceeded at once to shew that they were no longer disposed to observe any measures of amity with the prince stadtholder, nor even to preferve those outward appearances which might indicate a disposition to future conciliation. This was announced by diverting him of the government and command of the garrifon of the Hague; a measure not more violent in the act, than it was degrading in the execution, through the unufual circumfances with which it was accompanied.

The immediate and oftenfible motive affigned for this meafure, was a riot which had taken place at the Hague. The garrifon were charged with not taking immediate and effectual measures for preventing or suppressing it. The riot in itfelf, compared with those which every day occurred in other places, was a matter of little confequence. A few armed volunteers from fome neighbouring town came to parade at the Hague, equipped in their uniforms and peculiar badges, a proceeding which could not fail to irritate the inhabitants, who they knew were zealoufly attached to the perfon and interefts of the prince of Orange. It was fcarcely in the nature of things that a riot should not be the confequence; and the intruders were with fome difficulty preferved from becoming victims to their own temerity, and to the fury of the people: they, however, escaped without any material injury.

This affair was refented with z violence disproportioned to its magnitude, and taken up with a high hand by the adverse faction. Independent dependent of their defire to leffen the prince's authority, they likewife wifhed, and fearcely lefs, to fubdue the fpirit of the inhabitants of the Hague. The acting committee of the flates of Holland, determining not to let the measure Sept. 8th, cool, iffned a hafty refolution or decree, by 1785. which they deprived the prince of his government and command, forbidding the troops to receive the word from him, to obey his orders in any manner, or even to pay him any of the cuftomary military honours. To render the degradation complete, and as it were to add the incurable fling of a perfonal infult, they at the fame time ftripped him of his own bodyguards, and even of the hundred Swifs, who were defined merely to civil purpules, and to the support of flate parade and magnificence. The prince's remonstrances and protestations, in which he termed this refo-Jution a violent breach of the conflitution, an invation of his rights, an outrage offered to his authority, and an indignity to his perfon and character, could produce no other fatisfaction, than the contemptuous intimation, that the guards were maintained for the purpole of jupporting the grandeur of the flate, and not for the aggrandizement of the stadtholder.

It was impoffible that the prince and prince's, after fuch a public indignity, could, with any degree of propriety, continue longer in a place, which was the feat of the ceurt, of public bufine's, and of government, as well as the refidence of all the foreign minifters: they accordingly abandoned the Hague immediately; the prince reting to his own city of Breda, and the princefs with the children, to Weft Friezeland, where the people, notwithstanding the implacable enmity of the states of that province, were generally well affected to the Orange family. The prince and princes were obliged to perform these journies without any other guard or fecurity to their perfons than their own domeffics, although it was a feafon of the most lawless violence and tumult, and that the virulence of the opposite party was rifen to fuch a pitch, that on a late journey, tho' then attended by their guards, fuch a riot was raifed in a confiderable town which they paffed, that fome of their attendants were killed; and their happening to quit the carriage, and go into a house before it commenced, was perhaps fortanate with respect to their own fafety.

This meafure was foon followed by an order for furnifhing the guards with new colours, in which the arms of the houfe of Orange were totally omitted, and thofe of the province of Holland fubfituted in their place. These were prefented in the name of the flates, and a special order given to the officers, that the arms of the province, and no other, should be engraved on their gorgets.

The king of Prufia regarded this violent attack upon the authority, and perfonal infult offered to the fladtholder, with great but regulated indignation; he fill preferved the moft temperate language in his remonftrances; and while his expofulations placed in the fulleft light the wrongs and undeferved injuries fuffained by that prince, and fufficiently indicated that he was too much interefied in his caufe to permit his becoming ultimately a victim a victim to opprefion, yet for the present he appeared rather in the character of a friendly neighbour to both, and an amicable mediator, withing to reconcile the differences and mifunderftandings between the parties, than the direct advocate of either.

A hint was, however, about this time thrown out by his minifters, which feemed capable of infpiring fome prefent caution in the governing powers of Holland, by fhewing the open grounds for ferious claim and difcuffion which he poffeffed in his own right, whenever he chofe to occupy them; and the ease with which they might be applied to give a fanction to fudden movements, and to afford a cover for alarming meafures, if their contests with the prince flould be carried to fuch an extremity as might render them necessary. It was intimated to the states, that the king, in his own right, had matters of difcuffion of a long franding to fettle with them, and which nothing but a forbearance founded on friendflip could have permitted to remain fo long in a state of fufpension. That as they had now found it necessary to enter into a regulation and fettlement of their limits in Brabant and Flanders with the emperor, it would be no lefs proper and necessary, that they condescended to pay a fimilar regard to him, by an adjuftment of the difputed limits in East Friezeland and Guelderland; in order thereby to prevent a renewal of those differences which had heretofore taken place upon thefe fubjects, and to pay that attention to his claims and demands, which their nature and juffnel's required.

As this was merely an intimation, it probably produced no formal reply. Nor does it appear to have produced any ceffation in the violence of the measures purfued against the prince. The ruling powers at the Hagne, who repretented the flates of Holland and Weft Friezeland, in their anfwer to ' the king's manifetto or memorial upon that fubject, took care to lofe no part of that high dignity appertaining to the most supreme fovereignty. In thanking him for the regards he expressed to, and the interest he took in the affairs of the republic, after taking care to remind him that those two provinces form the principal part of that confituent body, they proceed further to obferve, that it was owing entirely to their particular refpect for him, and to the mutual regards and friendthip fubfilting between them, that they could at all enter into any explanation of their conduct upon the prefent occasion; but that from thefe motives, and to convince the king that no duplicity was intended on their part, but that their views, like their conduct, were open, manly, and confiftent (as it became fovereigns in all transactions with any of their fervants, however highly exalted by posts or privileges they might be) they would inform him, that they could not in any manner recede from their refolutions with respect to the government of the Hague: that in other refpects, in all cales of contest with foreign powers, they should at all times be defirous to accept the king's friendly intervention and mediation; but that in what related to internal government, to the fecurity of the flate, to public tranquillity, and particularly to the appointment, upperintendance, or difcharge of their their own officers or fervants, they could on no account derogate from their character of independent flates, by admitting of any interference; and that he was himfelf too good a judge, and too flrice a maintainer of the rights of fovereignty, to expect or to approve of fuch a derogation.

In other answers upon the fame occafion, and about the fame time, they disclaimed, in very loofe and general terms, all oppreflive and illegal acts or defigns, either against the stadtholder, or any other of their fervants; with the evidently implied refervation, of being themfelves the fole judges of what conflituted oppression or illegality. They attributed the king's applications to mifinformation and mifrepresentation, hoping (with an apparent fneer) that the ftadtholder could not poffibly have been fo forgetful of the relation in which he flood with the republic, as to be the means of conveying them; and adding, that it would be placing all the parties in a strange relative fituation indeed, if he were to make complaints of them to the king; a measure which in its confequences, if admitted, would tend to leave them nothing more than an empty name and very fhadow of fovereignty. They fpoke in the fame general manner of civil commotions, of measures expedient for their own fecurity, and of the necessity of putting an effectual ftop to feveral abufes and encroachments which tended to the detriment of the country.

Dec. 19, 1785. As a proof of the fmall regard which they paid to the king of Pruffia's remonstrances, they issued an order, that the military honours usually paid to the stadtholder, in all his different capacities of captain geueral, governor of the Hague, and commander of the garrifon, should in future be paid only to the prefident of their committee, as the reprefentative of the flates, and to the grand penfionary of Holland. This was in fome time followed by an order to difcharge all the troops in general of the province from their oath of fidelity to the ftadtholder, and to preferibe a new oath, by which they were bound to the ftates only. All thefe innovations were fubmitted to by the troops in general, both officers and foldiers, with the greatest reluctance, and in numerous inftances with apparent indignation. As the differences increafed, the stadtholder's power of disposing of the regimental commissions was suspended for an unlimited time, and this effential branch of his prerogative usurped. The caufe affigned, in answer to his remonstrances, for this measure, was not fo much a justification of a right to affume, as a reason for the use of power, " that the influence which " he derived from that authority " in the army was not, in the pre-" fent situation of affairs, deemed " confonant with the fecurity of the " ftate."

The domineering party no longer contained themfelves within any fort of bounds; they laid the heavieft hand of power over all thofe who gave marks of attachment to the ftadtholder's intereft. The virulence and malice of the contention was fo great, that tumults were almost continual; and while the rioters on one fide were feverely punished, even for petty exceffes, those on the other were protected in the groffest violence and outrage. They proceeded ceeded without reftraint, and without regard to general law, or particular conffitutions, to weed the magiftracies of all those who were even fuspected of any attachment to the Orange interest, filling up their places with the most turbulent of their own party; and even fubmitted to the democratic encroachments of the armed burghers, and thereby totally changed the nature of the old constitution, in order to carry that favourite point. They had taken the prefs entirely into their hands : while the most scurrilous invectives were every day publifhed, not only with impunity, but apparent encouragement against the ftadtholder, the most temperate writings in defence of his rights, or bare statement of their nature, subjected the publishers and the writers to fevere and certain punifhment.

Not that the Orange party was even then entirely devoid of a difposition to excess and outrage, nor perhaps in their hour are they more respectful of individual or constitutional rights. Certain it is, however unfortunately, that the first operation of civil diffensions is to fuspend those very laws of which each party affumes to be the affertor. To judge truly of the merits of political questions, we must refort to the original caufe of quarrel, and not look too minutely to the occafional infringements of right which intervene, and are in a manner inevitable in violent conteits. The disputed territory is trampled by those who defend as well as those who invade it. We must not therefore, as many are apt to do, form too hafty a conclusion to the difadvantage of mankind, and fuppofe, from the exceiles that arife on all fides, nor even because a departure from the principles fet out upon is observed in many controverties, that all pretences are falle, and all motives unjuft. Without prefuming to direct the judgment of our readers, we only point out the criterion, and we apprehend it is to be fought in those grand objects, and that general line of policy, which characterizes each contending party; and we are perfuaded that all English readers entertain a favourable disposition towards that which cements the natural union between the maritime powers and free conflitutions of England and the united ftates, and which tends to fecure in a chief magiltrate an effective authority, but limited by law.

Although the republican party carried their conftitutional innovations, and the violation of corporate and private rights with little comparative refiltance, the course of their affairs was not entirely fmooth. Man is fo indefinable a being, that he frequently engages, in contempt of all dangers and hazards, in the defence of trifles, at the fame time that he gives up objects of the greatest moment to his fecurity and happines, and submits to oppresfions that embitter his existence, with fearcely a murmur. In the prefent inflance, the wearing and prohibiting of orange - coloured cochades and ribbons feemed for a time to be the great object of conteft and animofity between the rival factions. Even the military, both officers and private men, notwithftanding their habits of implicit tubmission, became eager parties in this contest; and, in defiance of proclamations and punifhments, were continually flying in the face of their employers and paymafters, by wearing of this interdicted colour : to that it feemed for a time doubtful, whether the very harfh exercise of very itrong powers of government could have fupprefied the difplay of this enfign of party zeal, without flriking directly at the existence of the manufacture.

The prince ftadtholder and his family, after fojourning for fome confiderable time at Middleburgh in Zealand, when he found that the faction in Holland were proceeding to the utmost extremities against him, and that it became every day more apparent, that nothing lefs than an appeal to the last refort of princes could preferve those remains of his authority which were still left, had he even fubmitted to the lofs already fuffained, removed at length to the province of Guelderland. This was the most judicious meafure that he could poffibly have taken; for, befides that the flates of that province, as well as of its neighbour Utrecht, were entirely on his fide, and the little country of Over-Yfiel, from its fituation, entirely within his power whenever he found exercion abiolutely neceflary, he was likewije within fuch a diftance of the turbulent city of Utrecht, as at leaft to protect the flates of that province, whom they had already obliged to retire to Amersfort, from any obstraction or disturbance in their proceedings at that place. Thefe were, however, but fccondary objects, when compared with the great advantages which that fituation would afford, if matters were brought to a certain degree of extremity, through the nearness of the Pruffian territories, which inclosed Gueldres on two fides, with limits fo mixed and open, that the intercourfe could not be interrupted.

Obvious as theie advantages were;

they feemed to efcape the obfervation of the adverse faction in Holland, until they began to be perceived in their confequences. The prince still retained the command of the forces of five provinces, which were about equal in ftrength to those of Holland; fo that from his retreat to Guelderland he lay no longer at the mercy of his enemies. From the attachment of the troops to him, it was doubtful how far they might obey even the orders of their respective states, in withdrawing from his command, if fuch a fcene of diforder was once opened as might afford a colour for diferetionary conduct; or hold out a fanc-"tion to difobedience.

We are now, however, to look to foveral matters that preceded and led to this laft refource which the prince adopted, of retiring with z military force to his ftrong hold in Guelderland. Great expectations had been formed on both fides, from the affemblage of the flates of Holland and Weft Friezeland, which was to take place at the Hague in the middle of March. Although the fladtholder had no vote in that affembly, it would have been his duty to have attended, in order to give his advice, and to lay fuch propofals and matters relative to public affairs as he thought fitting, before them for regular discussion, had not the late affronts which he received put it out of his power to return to that place, until he was reftored to his former dignities and authority. The flates themfelves feemed to entertain no fmall apprehenfion of the turnuits which might take place upon that occasion, from the great and general attachment of the inhabitants to the prince, and the firong fentations of grief and and indignation, which the novelty and caufe of his abfence, with the public difplay of his degradation, were likely to produce.

To obviate these disagreeable effects, after a day of public prayer and failing had been supposed to diffufe a ferious disponition among the people, they illied a proclamation a few days previous to the meeting, strictly forbidding, under the fevereit penalties, all the usual popular marks of rejoicing, upon any public days or occasions whatever, particularly prohibiting the holfting of flags upon steeples or other places, and the felling or wearing of any badges of diffinction, efpecially of orange coloured cockades and risbands; which being a colour, they obferve, not fanctioned by authority, could only be worn from the fpirit of party; the delinquents, whether fellers or wearers, being fubjected to the heavy arbitrary penalties of imprifonment, corporal punithment, and even death, to be difcretionally inflicted : encouragement was held out to the most odious of men, informers; and in a degrading, arbitrary, and probably injudicious exertion of power, it was declared that those who did not inform should be found equally guilty for the mifprision, and punished as principals. The ftates at their March 15th, first meeting dijap-1785.

dy affembled, by an adjournment to the following day. On that morning, to fix an idea of the majefty of their fovereign affembly, as well as to awe the people, the garrifon were drawn out armed, and arrayed in their beft uniforms, oppofite the hall of the flates. A crowd of three or four thouland peo-Vol. XXVIII.

ple thewed fuch ftrong marks of diffatisfaction, and difpolition to tumult, that the fixed bayonets, and firm conduct and countenance of the foldiers, were abfolutely neceffary to keep them in order. But a new and very peculiar fource of difford remained still to be opened. A gate, which derived its name from the stadtholder's office, and the particular ule it was affigned to, posselfed the fingulit privilege (a. leaft in modern times) of never being opened, excepting when that first magiltrate of the flate was to pals through it upon public occasions, fuch as the present. The president of the ailembly, to fhew the fullnels of power, and to prepare the people for fubmiffion and acquiefcence in all other novelties, ordered this interdicted gate to be opened, and a detachment of grenadiers were affigned to the important fervice. This invidious measure was beheld with the highest indignation by the people; but the terror of the foldiers weapons, together with the fatisfaction of feeing that no attempt was made to pass through the gate, (the prevention of which was now made the point of honour, when the first was given up) ferved to prevent their proceeding to any aftual violence.

The burghers of the Orange party, confidering this first invation of privilege as the prelude to farther outrage, held a meeting in the night, where, after deep debate, it was determined to preferve, at all events and hazards, the purity of their favourite gate from the last degree of violation. On the third morning the fladtholder's gate was again opened, and matters were conducted with a reafonable degree of tranquillity through the day;

but upon the breaking up of the flates in the evening, the penfionary of Dort, whether through vanity, to fhew his contempt of the fladtholder, or to try the temper of the people, while the means of their chailifement were at hand, ordered his coach to be driven through the gate. This was the fignal of alarm, the people immediately interfered, both in preventing the defign, and in endeavouring to difcharge their fury upon the adventurous penfionary; the riot was violent, and those who were not engaged thuddered for the confequences, nothing lefs than a general maffacre of the unarmed populace being expected. In this initant of terror and danger, the horfe guards rufhed in with the utmost violence upon the crowd, flourishing their fwords with terrible threats, and the most dreadful parade of execution. In little more than a moment the tumultuous crowd were either overthrown by the horfes, and lying in heaps upon each other, or difperfed and flying on every fide. Never was fo violent a tumult fo fuddenly quelled, and with fo little mischief. Not a fingle man was killed, nor a fingle wound given with the fword; the horfes were the only combatants, and left many fore remembrances of their weight, and of the iron armour on their hoofs. It was no lefs remarkable that only a fingle prifoner was made, where all lay at the mercy of the victors. This unfortunate culprit was a fober tradefman, the mafter of a house and family : he had been fo active in the commencement of the riot as to be particularly confpicuous, which occafioned his being early fecured; and every body was in expectation of his being hanged, as an example, the following morning.

The conduct of the troops upon this occasion can never be too much praifed or admired, and fhould be received and adopted as a most excellent model in all cafes of fupprefling civil commotions. Had the infantry, who were quiet lookerson, undertaken to quell this riot, the flaughter, from the narrownefs of the place, the clofeness of the crowd, and the nature of their weapons, would have been immenfe: and when broken and intermixed with the populace (which would have been unavoidable) the conflict must have been attended with lofs to themfelves. Nor would the deftruction have been fmall to the people, if the cavalry had made that cruel use of their fwords which was fo entirely in their power, and of which they made fo effective and happy a difplay. Whatever share may be afcribed to difcipline in this excellent conduct, no doubt can be entertained but that a much greater was due to the private fentiments and difpofition of the troops.

This riot, together with the general ill temper of the people, put a ftop for fome time to the deliberations of the flates of Holland. So many interceffions were made for the life of the unfortunate perukemaker who had been taken up in the late tumult, that the fentence of death on him was changed to an order of imprifonment for 20 years.

In the mean time, the diffentions in the city of Utrecht became fo violent, that the ruling faction iffued the fingularly arbitrary decree, that not more than two perfons fhould, under any pretence, and under fevere penalties, flop to confer in the fireets. They were not only in a flate of hoffility with their fellow-citizens, and the flates of the the province, but they flew in the face of their own immediate delegates, who declared, that in confideration of their oaths, and a full knowledge that the dignities conferred on the fladtholder in 1749 had been granted by the unanimous voice of all the regents of that time, as the only means of preferving the nation, they could not in any manner concur in depriving him of them; although, if any new regulation fhould, with his own confent, and with the fame unanimity be adopted, they fhould by no means oppose fuch a reform, but act in concert with the flates in general. This moderation in their delegates could produce no corresponding effect in the conflituents, who, determined to fupport their violence by arms, hired foldiers, and procured officers from all parts, and at any expence, making every peffible preparation at the fame time to withstand a fiege vigoroufly if attacked, as they continually expected.

If the fubscriptions to the patriotic funds (which were to fupport the numberless petty armaments of this time) were really as large as reprefented, it would indeed be aftonishing, confidering the heavy loss which individuals as well as the republic had fuffained by the war with England, and the fubfequent prodigious expences and damage occafioned by the conteft with the emperor, first in the preparations for war and the overflowing of the country, and laftly in the purchase of peace, and the reparation which they were compelled to make to his fubjects for their damages. It was faid, that fubfcriptions from individuals of eight or ten thousand florins were common upon this occafion; and that fo large a fum as 100,000 (amounting to fomething between feven and eight thousand pounds) had been fent without a name; but this laft was probably no more than a lure, to excite a fimilar liberality from fuch an example.

In the mean time the republic was torn to pieces and convulfed in all its parts and members. Nothing could be more deplorable than the face of tumult, riot, and confusion which every where prevailed. Many of the towns prefented little lefs than a fcene of continual civil war. The multitude of ill-connected petry fovereignties, of which the republic is composed, afforded room for a general, as well as for particular degrees of anarchy, which could not perhaps have been equalled under any other form of government. Nor has it possibly been known in any civil contention, in which religion was not the object of the conteft, that the animofity and malice of the contending factions was carried to fo extreme an excels as in the prefent. Their riots were accordingly, and perhaps it may be faid, according to the peculiar genius and temper of the people, fierce, cruel, and bloody. Multitudes of people were faid to have been facrificed, without count or enquiry, in these tunalts, while the canals ferved commodioufly for the initant in hiding the effects of their matual enormity.

The debates in the affembly of the flates of Holland, upon the fubject of reftoring the fladtholder to his dignity, or at least to the government of the Hague, were conducted with a degree of heat and vehemence faid to be unequalled in the Dutch councils. Every method W29 was accordingly ufed, that the nature of fuch proceedings will admit, in order to conceal the particulars of what paffed in that affembly from the knowledge of the people. The count de Maillebois, who was fuppoled to be the fecret mover of moft, if not all, of the harfh meafures adopted againit the fladtholder, was now become to extremely odious, at leaft with one party, that he was very generally burnt in effigy in those places where they were prevalent.

After various debates upon the fubject, the grand queflion, with refpect to the command at the Hague, was carried against the prince of Orange in the affembly of the flates of Holland by a fingle vote, the July 27th. numbers being ten to nine. A protest was immediately entered by the equefirian order, as well as by the deputies or reprefentatives of fome towns, against this resolution, as being premature and violent, as well as unconstitutional and illegal.

This refolution was not filently acquiefced in by the fladtholder. He transmitted a flrong letter to the states of Holland, in which, after taking notice that he could confider this refolution as nothing lefs than a violent outrage upon his dignity and authority, and an ufurpation upon a right which did not admit of being doubted ; after obferving the defect of unanimity among themfelves, and the clofenefs of the division upon which a queftion of fuch importance was carried; he denies the legality of any one member of the confederacy depriving him of rights which had been unanimoufly conferred upon him by the whole union; and, though he by no means acknowledges the right even of the whole union to difpoffefs him of dignities and powers which were in the fulleft manner rendered hereditary in his family, yet, waving that queftion for the prefent, he obferves, that it would at leaft be neceffary, in order to give any colour of fanction to fuch a proceeding, that the retraction fhould be attended with the fame unanimity which prevailed in the donation.

Though this letter was confidered as amounting to a defiance by the most violent of the adverse faction, yet it induced the flates of Holland to a re-confideration (perhaps merely for form) of the late resolution; the result of which was only a farther confirmation of the measure, by a declaration that it was flriclly legal, and in all respects confonant to the confliction, and to the spirit of the general union.

The death of the late king of Prussia, and the accession of the prefent monarch, to whole fifter the fladtholder is married, could not be fupposed to weaken his interest at the court of Berlin. The new king indeed did not leave it long in doubt what part he was determined to take in favour of his brother-inlaw. For he fcarcely had Sept. zd. time to feel himfelt well in the throne, before he dispatched a long letter, fully declaratory of his fentiments, to the flates general; and, to give the greater weight to them, it was conveyed by no lefs a perfon than the count de Goertz, his minister of flate, in the character of envoy extraordinary and plenipotentiary.

In this nervous and fpirited letter he refrains from entering into any particular detail of the injuries offered to the fladtholder, referring them them for that, as well as for his own fentiments upon the fubject, to certain specified letters or memorials transmitted by his uncle and predeceffor, both to their high mightineffes, and to the states of Holland and Weft Friezeland; every part of which he now, for himfelf, renews and confirms. He takes care to remove every objection to his interference, as being unwarranted, intrutive, or dictatorial to a fovereign flate, by fhewing that the long and tried friendship which had for two centuries sublitted between his predeceffors and the republic, would even have demanded his friendly and mediatorial interpolition in the prefent unhappy and dangerous flate of their civil diffentions : that, exclusive of friendship, his situation as their nearest neighbour, and the vicinity of a part of his dominions to their territories, must necessarily prevent his being indifferent to any violent or effential change that was attempted to be made in the conffitution of the republic : but that, independent of these causes, the near relation in which he flood with the prince fladtholder, and the affection which he bore for the prince's his fifter, rendered it impofible that he could be unconcerned in feeing them degraded from their high rank and dignities, and the fladtholder arbitrarily deprived of his rights and prerogatives.

He therefore firongly but amicably prefied the flates general to use their powerful mediation in the molt ferious manner with the flates of Holland and Weit Friezeland, for fettling the prefent differences; and vo take fuch other measures as might appear necessary for healing the dangerous diffensions for glaringly prevalent, for redoring the prince to his rights, and enabling him to return with honour and propriety to the refumption of his high offices at the Hague : offering his own counfel and mediation, if it were neceffary, in conjunction with other friends and neighbours of the republic, to bring all remaining differences and matters of debate to an equitable, final, and happy termination, and in a manner that would be equally confonant to the honour and true interests of all the parties. He farther informed the flates, that they were to receive and confider all communications from the count de Goertz as coming directly from himfelf.

This early ditplay of the new king's character feemed to afford no fmall indication, that though the great Frederic was no more, the fpirit and vigour of his councils were by no means departed.

The flates of five of the provinces referred the confideration of the king of Pruffia's letter to the committee for foreign affairs; but those of Holland and Weft Friezeland, perfevering in their fystem, and bating nothing of their usual obstinacy, declaring their adhereace to the refolution of the preceding December, against the admission of any foreign interference in the regulation of their domession of their domession of the letter.

The court of Verfailles, confeious of having the game fo effectually in her own hands as to render all public intervention in the affairs of Holland, on her fide, totally unneceilary, could have no difposition to admit the interference of other powers, whele views and principles file knew to be diametrically oppofite to her own. She had accordingly prefented to the flates, tome confiderable time before, as a

guarded precaution against what was like to happen, a memorial couched in very equivocal terms, in which, after much parade of the French king's friendship and regards, and of his attachment to the subsisting alliance between them, he declares his wifhes to fee those abuses reformed, which had occafioned internal diffensions in the republic, and that he fhould be happy to fee tranquillity reftored upon the true principles of its conftitution ; but that, without pretending to meddle in the internal government of the feven provinces, he would on the contrary use his utmost endeavours to prevent their high mightineffes being troubled from without as well as from within.

The republican party was now become fo infolent, and their violence fo extreme, that they feemed not only to cast off all obedience to their own laws, but all regard to those of nations, and all respect to foreign fovereigns. A courier from the court of Berlin to that of London, upon his return was stopped, and narrowly escaped being rummaged, and his difpatches examined, by the populace in the town of Woerden. This outrage obliged the count de Goertz formally to demand a paffport from the states general for a courier he was fending with difpatches to the king his master.

The flates of Guelderland, after various flrong remonstrances, couched in terms of great indignation to those of Holland, for the encouragement which they had given, and the fupport they promifed, to the refractory or rebellious burghers in their towns of Hattern and Elbourg, declaring that fuch an undue interference in their government, and outrage offered to their fovereignty, muft, if perfevered in or repeated, lead to an immediate diffolution of the union, determined at length to remove this bone of internal and external contention, by applying force as the laft remedy for the eradication of the evil.

They accordingly paffed a written refolution, tantamount in effect to a committion, charging the prince fladtholder, as captain general, im-mediately to fend a sufficient number of troops, under the conduct of an experienced officer, to these towns, with injunctions to continue there until further orders; but that if the inhabitants were to make any refistance to the performance of this fervice, fuch officer was authorized, in fpite of all obstacles, to support the fovereign authority of their noble mightinesses, by proceeding to force and violence in the effablishment of those garrisons.

The ftates likewife wrote to the magistracies of both towns (who were equally difobeyed and flighted with themfelves by the turbulent burghers) inclosing a copy of their refolution, and requiring them to give every affistance in their power to the troops; and particularly to exhort the inhabitants to the most docile fubmission to all injunctions that might come from their affembly.

General Spengler, with four regiments, and proper artillery, was appointed by the fladtholder to this fervice, with flrict injunctions, if pofible, to avoid the fledding of blood. The armed burghers of Hattem, being reinforced by as many volunteers as money or party zeal could procure from different quarters, exhibited a great parade of making a most obstinate refiftance.

tance. Their cannon were mounted on the walls and works, and on the approach of the stadtholder's little army, as they called the regular forces by way of contempt, fired feveral rounds of artillery with great brifknefs, but with fo little judgment in the direction, as not to produce the smallest effect. As foon as Spengler arrived within a proper diftance, he pointed his artillery, in order to do the least possible mifchief, at the chimnies and tops of the houfes only. This, however, along with the bold advance and near approach of the troops, foon produced the defired effect; the armed burghers, with their adherents and auxiliaries, abandoned the town; and Spengler's men entered at one gate, as they were retiring through another. Elbourg was abandoned in the fame manner, and with still lefs trouble.

As the public papers were entirely in the hands of the republicans, fo nothing could be more ridiculous than the pompous and gasconading accounts published of the paltry affair at Hattem. The arnied burghers and volunteers were defcribed as inheriting all the valour, and all the prowefs, which had ever been attributed to the heroic ages. The contemptible invading army had been repulfed and put to flight, with a confiderable flaughter of men and officers, who were plainly diftinguished as they dropped or were carried off; and, to give the better colour to the tale, fome fmall lofs was acknowledged on their own fide. Yet, in the moment of victory, they abandoned all these advantages, merely in compliance with the requifitions of many of their diftant and most respectable friends, who, fhuddering under the apprehension of any wanton or needlefs profusion of patriotic blood, preffed them to referve their courage for some occasion more worthy of it—than the defence of their native town, and the protection of their houses, posfessions, wives, and families.

In the fame style of delusion, nothing could be more flocking or deplorable than the accounts which they published of the enormities, the plunder, and cruelties, committed by the troops upon their gaining poffettion of Hattem and Elbourg. It was no wonder that the public at large, and effectativ thofe at a diffance, fhould nave been imposed on by these representations, when even the flates of Guelderland, notwithstanding their vicinity, fwallowed the delution fo implicitly, that under the double impression of indignation at the conduct of the troops, and compassion for the fuppoled fufferers, they iffued a hafty proclamation, promifing fully to indemnify and to grant adequate fatisfaction to all perfons who had fuftained lofs or injury from them.

To the difappointment and mortification, however, of all lovers of the marvellous, as well as to the great vexation of the faction themfelves, general Spengler's detail to his mafters, the states, of the operations of the troops under his command, was soon published, by which it appeared that not a fingle man had been killed of wounded on either fide in the boulted action of Hattem; and that the difcipline of the troops had been fo exact, and their conduct fo laudable, that there was not a fingle complainant from either town to appear against them.

changing their late boaffing into lamentation, and, notwithttanding that the ftates of Guelderland had publithed an amnefty in favour of all who would return to their houles within a limited time, filled all places with their clamours, on the woeful detail of their loffes and fufferings; the effect of their complaints being the more quickened by the heavy burthen which they proved to their friends, in the various towns where they took refuge.

The taking of these two towns was confidered or reprefented by the adverse faction, not only as the fignal, but the actual commencement of civil war; and nothing was to be heard but execrations, as well against the flates of Gueldres, as the prince fladtholder In the province of Holland effectially, the flames feemed to be blown up nearly to the greatefl height at which they were capable of arriving All regard to forms was now laid ande, in completing the deposition by force of those magistrates, senators, and members of the respective town councils, who were known or fulpected to be of the opposite party.

The states of Holland, Sept. 22d. without regard to the mission and prefence of the count de Goertz, immediately fulpended, for an indefinite time, the plince fladtholder from all the functions appertaining to his office of captain general within their province; and discharged the troops from that part of their military oath which bound them to obey his orders. At the fame time they recalled their regiments from Mastricht, and other garrifons without the province, and ordered a ftrong line of troops to be formed along the inland frontier towards Utrecht and Guelderland, and magazines to be provided for their fubfiftence during the winter; general Van Ryffel, their commander, being likewife ordered to be in constant force and readinefs for fuccouring and protecting the city of Utrecht, if any attempt fhould be made upon it, under the orders of the flates of that province, who were affembled at Amersfort. Such was the deplorable flate of affairs in this once great and flourishing republic, towards the close of the year 1786.

Remarks by Mr. Fox on the minister's opinion concerning the political connection between Great Britain and Hanover. Major Scott calls on Mr. Burke to bring forward his charges against Mr. Hastings. Mr. Burke relates in reply an anecdote of the duke of Parma. Grand debate on the duke of Richmond's proposed fortification of the dockyards. Instructions to the board of land and jea-officers, and extracts from their report. Mr. Pitt's metion and arguments in jupport of the plan proposed, as necessary, as best adapted to their purpose, as tending to increase the effects of our naval jorce, and to reduce the army. Amendment to Mr. Pitt's motion by Mr. Bastard and Sir William Lemon. Mr. Sheridan's speech in favour of the amendment; first he sherves that the plan proposed was dangerous to the constitution; he denies it would reduce the standing army, and if it did, he proves that in the fame proportion it would increase its power; 2 dly, he denies that it is sanctioned by the report of the board of officers, the extracts from the report prove the members were not agreed; the report itself founded on hypothetical juggestions from the master general. Mr. Pitt's motion rejected by the cafting wote of the Speaker. Debate in the bouse of lords on the new clause in the mutiny bill for subjecting officers by brevet to the military law; amendment proposed by lords Carlifle and Stormont; rejected on a division; question started, subciber an officer could refign his commission at pleasure; opinions of the lord chancellor and lord Loughborough.

THE third feffion of the prefent parliament was opened on the 24th of January 1786, by a fpeech from the throne, in which his majelty, after having mentioned the amicable conclusion to which the difputes that threatened an interruption to the tranquillity of Europe had been brought, the friendly diipolition of foreign powers towards this country, the extension of trade, the improvement of the revenue, and the increase of public credit, informed his parliament that the refolations which they had laid before him, as the basis of an adjustment of the commercial intercourse between Great Britain and Ireland, had been by his direction recommended to the parliament of that kingdom, but that no effectual step had hitherto been taken thereupon, which could enable them to make any further progress in that falutary work. work. He afterwards called the attention of the houfe of commons to the effablishment of a fixed plan for the reduction of the national debt, a measure which he trusted the flourishing flate of the revenue would be fufficient to effect, with little addition to the public burthens. He concluded with faying, that the vigour and refources of the country, so fully manifested in its prefent fituation, would encourage his parliament to give their utmost attention to every object of national concern ; particularly to the confideration of fuch measures as might be necefiary, in order to give further fecurity to the revenue, and to promote and extend, as far as poffible, the trade and general industry of his fubjects.

An addrefs * in the ufual form being moved and read in the houfe of lords, the earl Fitzwilliam propoled to omit that part of it which related to the commercial negociations with Ireland; first, as nugatory, it being acknowledged in the fpeech that nothing more could be done on the fubject; fecondly, as containing an indirect reflection upon the conduct of the parliament of Ireland; and thirdly, as tending to revive the discussion of a meafure almost universally reprobated in one kingdom, received with great jealoufy and alarm in this, and marked with the difapprobation of a confiderable minority in both houfes of parliament. An amendment to the fame purpofe, and for the fame reafons, was moved in the houfe of commons by lord Surry; and although both the addreffes were carried as originally moved, without any divifion, yet the fpeech itfelf underwent a confiderable degree of animadverfion in both houfes, principally on account of the vague and general terms in which it was worded, and the fcanty information it held out to parliament.

As the debate on the address to his majetly on the first day of the feffion, is always confidered as open to any general observations on the state of the nation, Mr. Fox took this opportunity to enter at large into the fituation in which we flood with refpect to the feveral powers of Europe. He ftrongly cenfured the impolitic conduct of his majefty's ministers, in not cultivating continental alliances, and their negligence in being perpetually behind hand in all their foreign negotiations. It was owing, he faid, to their criminal mifconduct that the house of Bourbon had got the flart of us in their late treaty with the United Provinces, and that our ambaffador at the Hague had been exposed to the ridicule of prefenting an ufelefs memorial to the flates on the fubject, after the above treaty had been actually ratified. This treaty, which the court of Verfailles had perfuaded the United States to enter into (rashly indeed he thought, and impolitically on the part of the latter) and which effectually fecured Holland in its interefts, he confidered as highly dangerous and hoffile to this country, in as much as it combined France, Spain, and Holland, three of the most powerful maritime pow-

* The addrefs in the house of lords was moved by the carl of Morton, and feconded by lord Fortefcue; in the house of commons it was moved by Mr. Smyth, member for Pomfret, and feconded by Mr. Addington, member for the Devizes. ers of Europe, in a confederacy against Great Britain.

In order to counterbalance the mischievous tendency of this confederacy, a more close connection with the courts of Petersburg and Vienna feemed naturally to fuggeft itself. But what had been the conduct of his majefty's ministers? The emperor, who was the most able, as well as the most likely, to cut out work for France, in cafe of a future war, had been imprudently difgusted by the part which the king, as elector of Hanover, had taken with refpect to the electorate of Bavaria, and by his joining with the Germanic princes in a league, founded on the plea of preferving the liberties of the empire. He defired the houfe to recollect, that in all her wars, France had been most embarraffed by her continental fituation, and the dread of an attack from the neighbouring powers; the whole of her policy therefore had been directed to engage them in fuch a manner as to fecure their neutrality, and by that means free her from the burthen of maintaining a ruinous frontier establishment; and hence it was, that in her late contest with Great Britain, fhe had been enabled to aid her refources by a reduction of her army in the midft of a war, and to apply the favings to the increase of her maritime strength. And what were we to expect in a future war? She was fafe by the family compact on the fide of Spain; fhe had, by the late treaty, fecured Holland in her interest. The em. peror (whofe defigns, notwithstanding the treaties fubfilting between them, and all the endearing bonds of family connection, it was well known the still watched with jealous apprehenfions) was the only power in Europe she had any cause to dread. France therefore had nothing to wifh for before the late league was made, but that fome circumftances fhould happen to create a jealoufy and diflike of Great Britain in the emperor. That circumstance we had ourselves provided ; by the effects of that league we had fecured the frontier of France gratis, at a moment when the would have paid any price for it, as was apparent from the great fums fhe had expended in bringing about the peace between the United Provinces and the emperor. The most fanguine dreamer of national good fortune could not have pictured to himfelf the poffibility of fuch a fortunate event.

With respect to Ruffia, a crifis had occurred two years ago, of which this country ought to have taken advantage, and which he himself had at the precise moment pointed out in that house : the moment to which he alluded was that when the empress of Russia had settled her differences with the Porte on the fubject of the Crimea, when overtures of the most advantageous nature were made to the British coart. At the fame time, though he was convinced that the best opportunity for treating with Ruffia had been loft, yet he expressed his fatisfaction at having heard, from good authority, that a treaty was then actually negociating, and in a fair way of being concluded.

Mr. Fox next adverted to the negociation for a commercial treaty, which was then on the point of being opened at Paris. He gave a decive opinion againft the policy of fuch a meafure; appealing to the experience of former time which, he faid, proved that this nation had grown grown great, profperous, and flourithing, from the moment that file quitted all commercial connexions with France. The felection of a diffinguithed member of oppolition. whole knowledge of commercial affairs had given no fmall trouble to the minister in the preceding feffion, for the negociation of this treaty, and the fingularity of the time of its commencement, were the objects of much pointed raillery. By the articles of the peace of Verfailles, a treaty of commerce was to have been fettled between this country and France on or before the first of January 1786, and from that day all negociation was to be at an end: but now that the time of negociation was paft, the board of trade were bufy with the fubject, and were about to fend out a nego-The fame unfeemly, but ciator. more criminal mismanagement, had marked their conduct refpecting the treaty between France and Holland, against the conclusion of which fir James Harris was directed to prefent a memorial to the flates, but unfortunately feveral days after it had been ratified. The like preposterous arrangement of public bufinefs had alfo taken place in the projected fettlement with Ireland; when, after the commercial propofitions had been transmitted by his majefty's fervants from that country, and just as the British parliament was called upon to vote them, the board of trade proceeded to cnquire whether the propositions were, in fact, fuch as were fit for either country to accept.

Upon this fubject, Mr. Fox remarked with fome triumph, the flat contradiction which the event had given to the arguments used by the minister and his supporters, upon the propriety of first taking the fenfe of the Irifn parliament, in order to afcertain their expectations, before the English parliament was called upon to confider the subject. He put the chancellor of the exchequer in mind of the confidence with which he had again and again told the hovie, refrecting the relative atustion of the two countries. that it was int fible things could remain as they were; and defired to know, what was the meaning of that part of his majefty's speech which related to this fubject, if it was not that things must remain us they were?

Mr. Fox, finally, took a concife view of the affairs of India, infifting principally on the alarm, the difguft, and indignation, which certain regulating claufes in Mr. Pitt's bill had juilly occasioned amongst the company's fervants in India; and upon the extraordinary orders fent out by the board of controul for refloring to the Nabob of Arcot the collection and management of the revenues of the Carnatic, which lord Macattney, from the conviction of the necessity of taking them, not out of his hands, but out of the hands of his agents, Britifh ufurers, who plundered the natives and robbed him, had vefted in the company. It was owing, he faid, to this order, that lord Macartney had refigned his government, and that the company had been deprived of the fervices of that able and uncorrupt nobleman.

When Mr Fox had finished, the chancellor of the exchequer, after a short pause, rose and faid, he waited to see if any member had objections to make to the address, as the right hon. gentleman who spoke fpoke last had certainly made none. He could not avoid bearing tettimony to that peculiar and almost inflinctive dexterity with which that gentleman was enabled, on all occafions, to leave out of the difcuffion fuch parts of the fubject as were unfavourable to him; and he had on the prefent occasion an opportunity of equally admiring a fimilar talent in him, of introducing, however foreign and unconnected, fuch matter as he expected would be favourable. He did not mean, however, to follow him in those deviations from the fubject. The right hon. gentleman had affumed the liberty of fpeaking of foreign politics without reftraint, on the ground of his not being a minister; and he for his part should avail himfelf of the delicacy and caution requisite in that character, and should not suffer himself to be diverted from it.

Mr. Pitt then acquainted the house, that the treaty with the emprefs of Ruffia was in a flate of great forwardness, and he had every reafon to hope would be completed in fuch a manner as to give general fatisfaction. With respect to the Germanic confederacy, it was a measure, he faid, with the merits or demerits of which his majefty's miniflers had no concern ; and he defired to have it underftood, that Great Britain was by no means committed by any league lately entered into by the elector of Hanover, but was in the prefent inflance, what the always ought to be, perfectly unconnected with the politics of that electorate. He was clear and explicit upon this point. Accident, he faid, had placed the fovereighty of that country and of this in the fame hands; but it by no means followed that the interefls of each muit neceffarily be the fame, though perhaps it might be for their mutual advantage to make their interests as reconcilable to each other as possible. He pointed out the inconfidency of Mr. Fox's apprehenfions of our being involved in difficulties through the means of his majesty's German territories, and yet his expecting that the administration of those territories fhould be fubordinate to, and regulated by, the ministers of Great Britain; as if that very circumstance would not bind this country on all occasions to affiit and protect the electorate: whereas the only way for Great Britain to avoid embroiling herfelf in quarrels for Hanover, was by our government being kept, as much as poffible, independent of Hanoverian politics.

He next adverted to Mr Fox's remarks on the affairs of India, and defended the obnoxious claufe in the India bill against the invectives with which it had been treated, as militating against the trial by juries. He contended, that there might be tribunals established in certain cases that would be found to answer equally all the purposes of public juffice; and he confidered the prefent as refembling in its conflitation the beft fort of special jury, and as totally exempt from the imputation of hardship, fince no man became fubject to it but by his own choice. With respect to the orders relative to the nubob of Arcot, he remarked, that though the policy of the measure was with lord Macartney, yet the good faith of the nation required that the facrifice fhould be made.

Having followed Mr. Fox through thefe parts of his speech, he pock notice of the contemptuous manner he had treated that part of his majefty's fpeech which refpected the flourifhing flate of our finances. He was, however, glad to find that he had changed his fentiments a little fince the laft feffion, and that inflead of the great deficiency he had then foretold, he had now declared that no perfon could have ever doubted but there muft be fome furplus. He then declared, that it would fhortly appear, that the furplus was confiderable and important.

He laftly turned to Mr. Fox's obfervations upon the fubject of Ireland, and condemned in the ftrongeft terms the impropriety of fpeaking on a fubject of fuch delicacy in the unguarded and inflammatory manner they had just heard. He recapitulated the arguments used in the last session in defence of those meafures; and concluded with lamenting their failure, and expressing his fincere regret, that while this country had to contemplate the present prosperous state of her affairs, and the pleafing profpect be-fore her, she had not been able to extend the bleffings still further, by communicating those of her commerce to the fifter kingdom.

Mr. Pitt's idea that Great Britain was not committed by treaties made by the king, as elector of Hanover, was ridiculed by Mr. Fox with great fuucefs. He put a variety of cafes, in feme of which the fovereign might, with one part of his forces, endeavour to fupport a particular caufe, and with the other attempt to pull it down; in others, Great Britain might be called on to act againft the electorate, and lend a hand to ftrip their king of his hereditary dominions; nay, a Britifh army might be directed to act hoftilely against troops, led in person by their sovereign, as elector of Hanover.

Before the house rose, Major Scott (member for Well Looe, and agent to the late governor general of Bengal) observing Mr. Burke in his place, begged leave to remind the house that Mr. Hastings had been arrived in England fome months; and he therefore called upon that gentleman to produce the charges which he had pledged himfelf in the preceding feffion to bring forward against Mr. Hastings, and to fix the earlieft day poffible for the difcuffion of them. Mr. Burke replied to the major, by relating an anecdote of the great duke of Parma, who, being challenged by Henry the fourth of France " to bring his forces into the open field, and inftantly decide their difputes;" answered with a smile, " that he knew very well what he had to do, and was not come fo far to be directed by an enemy."

The first object of Feb. 27. importance that engaged the attention of parliament in the prefent fession, was a measure which originated with the duke of Richmond, the master general of the ordnance. It was a plan for fortifying the dock-yards at Portsmouth and Plymouth.

The houfe of commons had in the preceding feffion expressed their unwillingness to apply any part of the public money for this purpose, before they were made acquainted with the opinions of such perfons as were best able to decide concerning the utility and propriety of such a measure. In confequence of this intimation, a board of military and paval officers was appointed by the king, king, with the mafter general of the ordnance as their prefident; and the proposed plan of fortifications was referred to them for their opinions and advice. After they had inveftigated the fubject, and had made their report thereon, the plans recommended were laid before a board of engineers to make an eilimate of the expences neceffary to carry them into execution.

This effimate, which amounted to no lefs a fum than 760,097l. Mr. Pitt laid before the house on the 10th Feb. 10th of February 1786, 1786. the day on which the reft of the ordnance eftimates were brought forward; and it was originally intended by Mr. Pitt that it fhould be debated and decided upon, together with the latter effimates, as a mere collateral queftion. Lieutenant-general Burgoyne, who was one of the board of officers that made the report, expreffed his defire, that before the bufinefs was further proceeded upon, fo much both of the report itfelf, and of the inftructions upon which it was founded, as could be made public with fafety to the flate, thould be laid upon the table of the houfe of commons. The reafon alledged by him was, that the houfe might otherwife unwarily be led to think that the report fanctioned the plan of fortifications proposed, more than it really did.

In support of this mode of proceeding, Mr. Sheridan, Feb. 16th. on the 16th of February, moved " for a copy of the appointment of the board of naval and military officers, and of fuch parts of their inftructions, and of their report, as his majesty's discretion might deem proper to be made public, with perfect confiftency to the fafety of the state ;" but as the board in question had been constituted by circular letters from the king, without any official commiffion or appointment, Mr. Pitt fubflituted another motion, the fame in effect as the foregoing, but more conformable to the fact, which paffed unanimoufly.

Thefe papers * being laid before the houfe, Mr. Pitt, on the 27th of February, introduced the measure in the form of a general refolution, to the following Infructions for our right trufty and right entirely beloved coufin and counfeller Charles Duke of Richmond, Lenox, and Aubigny, Maiter General of our Ordnance, whom we have thought fit fhall be Prefident of a Beard of Land and Sea Officers, appointed under cur royal authority, to investigate, and report to us on the proper system of defence, and on the expediency and ethicacy of the propofed plans for better fecturing our dock-yards at Portfmouth and Plymouth. Given at our Court at St. James's, the thirteenth day of April 1785, in the twenty-fifth year of our reign.

UPON the receipt of these instructions, you are to give notice to the members named in the inclosed lift, of the day on which they are to atlentble at Portfinouth, and fix the hour and place where they are to meet. lowing effect: " That it appears to " this houle, that to provide effec-" tually for fecuring his majefty's " dock-yards at Portfmouth and " Plymouth, by a permanent fyf-" tem of fortification, founded on

As foon as feven of our faid land officers, and five of our faid fea officers are affembled, they are to proceed to bufinefs, and to adjourn from time to time as they fhall fee occasion.

You are to appoint fome intelligent officer to act as feeretary, who is regularly to enter in a book the proceedings of the board.

In cafe of difference of opinion, the reafons for fuch difference are to be ftated, either jointly or feparately, and are to be figned by each member prefent.

The matters treated of, and the opinion of the members, are not to be divulged without our royal permiffion.

As the inquiries neceflary to be made, to enable the board to give a well-informed opinion on this important fubical, mult branch out into a variety of matter, we have directed that they flould be arranged under feparate heads; which have been accordingly prepared for this purpole, and are hereunto annexed. Or thele the board are to report their opinion to us.

Under each head is added a fet of more minute and detailed queflions and obfervations. The anfwers which the board will give to them, will form the bafis of their more general conclutions. Thefe queflions, with the anfwers, as well as thefe infructions, the feparate heads, and the report, are to be entered in a book, containing the proceedings of the board; which are also to be laid before us, that we may be able at any time to refer to the grounds on which their opinions have been formed.

If any other matter, not contained under those heads or quefilions, should occur, and appear to the board to throw more light on this subject, they will add it to their report, with any farther observations they may think proper to submit to our confideration.

The first part of the fubject referred to the investigation of the board, is, in general terms, the proper fyitem of defence for Portinouth and Plymouth; which will naturally lead them to confider, whether a fystem of naval defence alone; a fystem of land defence, from troops alone; or a fystem of naval and land defence combined, can be relied ou for the protection of the dock-yards of Portfmouth and Plymouth; or whether fortifications are neceffary: if they are, the fecond part of the fubject referred to this board, viz. the expediency and efficacy of the proposed plans, will next require their attention.

But before they can agree on any fyftem of defence, it will be neceffary for them to agree on the nature and extent of the attack against which it is to be calculated, and on the circumstances to which the kingdom may be reduced by the events of war, when called upon to defend its dock-yards.

Note.—(Then follow fix data, flating circumflances that may prevent the fleet from affording effectual protection to the dock-yards, the force of the enemy againft which it may be prudent to guard, the number and fort of troops that may be had for the defence of thefe places, and the time it may require to collect the flyength of the country from other parts of the kingdom. Thefe fix data are omitted, becaufe the matter they contain is not proper to be divulged, and becaufe the board effablified two new data in place of the two firth, and confiderably varied two of the others.)

The board will vary or add to these data as they shall see occasion.

The heads and questions under them will beft explain the manner in which the board is to proceed in applying thefe data.

We have ordered that fuch naval affiftance as may be wanted at the ports fhall be given ; and that fuch engineers and artillery officers as the board may with to examine, fhall attend them; they will also have the proper plans and furveys laid before them.

It will be neceffary for the naval officers to examine the fhores, as well as for the land officers to fludy the country, which must undoubtedly take up time; but we hope that the board will be able to make their report by the first week in June.

With refpect to calculations of expence, or making out plans upon any ideas that may be proposed, the board will give their directions for this purpose, either to the engineer on the spot, or to the committee of engineers at the Tower, as they shall see occasion; and their reports are to be entered in the proceedings of the board.

As accurate effinites can only be made on works which in every particular are finally fettled, and upon detailed drawings and fections of them, fuch computations as may give a general idea of the probable amount of the expence will be fufficient. G. R.

Report of the board of land and fea officers appointed by your majefty to inveftigate and report on the proper fyittem of defence, and on the expediency and efficacy of the proposed plans for better fecuring the dock-yards at Portimouth and Plymouth.

Having fully taken into our confideration your majefly's infructions, under your majefly's fignet and fign manual, dated the thirteenth day of  $A_1$  ril 1785, and obferving that your majefly has been gracioufly pleated to allow us to vary or add to the data contained therein, as we fhould fee occation, we have availed ourfelves of your majefly's permiflion fo to do; and as, in confequence of fuch alterations, fome of the heads and queftions under them appeared to us to have been already and wered in fome of the data, we conceived any difeu on of them became unneceffary, as will more fully be feen in the minutes of our proceedings herewith laid before your majefly.

We, therefore, in obedience to your majefly's commands, beg leave humbly to report to your majefty, that we have agreed on the following data, as the grounds on which our fubicquent opinions have been formed.

First datum, agreed to unanimously by both land and sea officers at Portsmouth and Plymouth.

That it is perfectly right, neceffary, and wife, effectually to provide in time of peace for the fecurity of your maiefty's dock-yards at Portfinouth and Plymouth, by fortifications capable of refifting fuch an attack as an enemy may be able to make upon them during the abfence of the fleet, or whilft, from other caufes, the fleet may be prevented from affording its protection to the dock-yards.

Second datum, agreed to unanimously by both land and fea officers at Portfmouth and Plymouth.

That, as far as is confident with due confiderations of expence, and the probable firength of the land forces, it will be advifeable to provide a defence by fortifications for the dock-yards at Portfmouth and Plymouth, againit the chances of the fleet, or fuch part thereof as might give them protection, being abfent for-(a certain time named, which is omitted, as not being proper to be difslofed.)

Note.—The third datum, flating the force of the enemy, againft which it may be prudent to guard, the number of embarkations, and the detailed account of fhips proper for this purpofe, and agreed to unanimoufly by both land and fea officers, is omitted, as it cannot be proper that fuch particulars flould be difelofed.

The fourth datum, afcertaining the precife number and fort of troops which may reafonably be expected to be had for the defence of Portinouth and Plymouth, as sitablified by the land officers, and an obfervation thereupon, is of a nature not proper to with the rest of the ordnance estimates.

In fupport of the refolution, Mr. Pitt undertook to prove the following politions: First, that the fortifying the dock-yards at Portfmouth and Plymouth was a measure of abiolute necessity; fccondly, that the plan of fortifications proposed by the duke of Richmond was the beft possible plan for that purpose; thirdly, that these fortifications would to be difclofed. The diffent of lieutenant-generals Burgoyne and Earl Percy, is in fubftance contained in their provifo, under another head hereinafter flated at length; but the particular reafons contained in this diffent of lieutenantgenerals Burgoyne and Earl Percy, are for the fame reafon omitted.

The fifth datum, agreed to unanimoufly by the land officers, afcertaining the time that it may require before the firength of the country can be collected from other parts of the kingdom in fuch force as to defeat fuch an attempt as is fuppofed, is for the fame reafon omitted.

Your materity's land officers at Portfmouth and Plymouth are unanimoufly of opinion, that fuch is the fituation of the prefent works, that no finifhing, repairs, or improvements, without additional works, can, under the circumflances of the data, afford that degree of fecurity to the dock-yards—(for the time mentioned in the preceding datum) as may enable your majelty to employ your whole fleet, if meetilary, on foreign fervice.

Note.—All the details relative to the infufficiency of the prefent fortifications, unanimoufly agreed to by the land officers, are omitted.

Your majefty's land officers, both at Portfmouth and Plymouth, are unanimoufly of opinion, that a fyftem of detached ferts is the most proper for the purpole of protecting the dock-yards.

Your majefty's land officers, both at Portfmouth and Plymouth, are unanimouly of opinion, that the fyftem of detached works, as propofed, has, in the extensive futuations of Portfmouth and Plymouth, this advantage, that the fecurity to be derived therefrom will not be wholly delayed till the whole of the propoled plan is executed, but an additional degree of ftrength will be acquired as the detached works are progrefively finished.

Your majefty's land officers, both at Portfmouth and Plymouth, are unanimoufly of opinion, that the fituations of the feveral places therein specified, are well chosen for detached works.

Your majefty's land officers at Portfmouth and Plymouth are unanimcufly of opinion, that the new works proposed are well adapted to those fituations.

Note.—The detail of the peculiar advantages of these works, ununimously agreed to by the land officers, is omitted.

Your majefty's land officers at Plymouth are unanimoutly of opinion, that the diffance of the fituation proposed, in Leu of Merrifield, from the dock, appears too great for the circumfhances of the data; and would, if fortified, require a greater garrifon and greater expense, and would not afford the fame focurity to the dockyard as Merrifield, and therefore the land officers mult give the petforence to Merrifield.

Your majefty's land officers at Portfinouth are unanimoufly of opinion, that the propoled finithing for works already began, the improvements to eld ones, and the plan for re-building South-Sea caffle, will, tegether with the new works propoled, give a reafonable degree of fecurity for your melefty's dock-yard at Portfinouth, for the time and under the circumfrances of the date, with a guilfea of the numbers before specified (regulars and militia) which the land efficers are of opinion is fufficient for its defence : whereas the prefact works, then here ne would be the means of giving a greater fcope and effect to the operations of our fleets; and laltly, that they would diminify the ftanding army.

With respect to the necessity of the measure, he faid, that the board had fully eftablished that point, by declaring, that neither any naval or military force, nor even both united, could afford fuch a degree of fecurity as was adequate to the importance of our dock-yards, but that paired, finished, and improved, would require a larger force for their defence, with which they would still be ineffectual for the purpose of fecuring this dockyard.

Your majeity's land officers at Plymouth are unanimoufly of opinion, that a gaurifon-(of the numbers before fpecified, regulars and militia) appears fufficient, if the propoled new works and repair of old ones are executed; and that for the prefent works, even when repaired, a much larger garrifon would be ineffectual for the purpole of fecuring this dock-yard.

Your majeity's land officers having taken into confideration the whole fituation of Plymouth, are unanimoufly of opinion, that the proposed new works, in addition to the old ones, when properly repaired, as fuggetled in our proceedings, (with a garrifon of the numbers before specified, regulars and militia) will give a reasonable degree of security for your majefly's dock-yard at Plymouth for the time and under the circumstances of the data.

Your majeliy's land officers, as far as they were respectively concerned at Portfmouth or Plymouth, do report to your majely, that from the report of the committee of engineers at the Tower, which they have unanimously agreed to adopt, it appears, that the expence of the works proposed for fecuring your majely's dockyards at Portimouth and Plymouth, will be as follows:

Note .- This paper has been already delivered to the houfe.

Your majefty's inftructions under the 23d head, having required, what improvements or alterations, or what other fythem of defence, the board would fuggeft, the unanimous opinion of your majefty's fea officers is, that—(a certain number therein fpecified) of gun-boars at Portimouth and Plymouth will form a great arm of defence against an invading enemy. And your majefty's land officers entircly concur in this opinion with the fea

And your malefly's land officers entirely concur in this opinion with the fea officers, confidering thefe gun-boats as a great improvement in the defence of thefe places.

* Your malefty's land and fea officers beg leave to recommend a fet of fignals to be eftablished on the projecting head-lands—(of certain parts of the coaft therein fpecified) with intelligent mariners to make them, as of effential advantage in conveying early intelligence of the approach of an enemy, and for the protection of commerce.

Your majerty's land and fea officers unchimoufly recommend-(an improvement in the fupply of fresh water at Plymouth, if to be had at a reafonable expence.)

The board has no other improvement, or other fystem of defence to fuggest toyour majesty.

Laftly, your majefty's land and fra officers humbly beg leave to obferve, that they make this report to your majefty, in full confidence, that the providing an #dditional fecurity to the dock-yards at Portfmouth and Plymouth is in no respect inconfident with the nelectary exertions for the fupport of the navy; which they confider that fortifications were abfolutely neceffary in addition to both. Secondly, with refpect to the mode of fortification, they had declared the plan fuggefted by the mafter general of the ordnance to be the moft eligible, as being the moft adequate to the defence of the places in queftion, capable of being manned by the fmalleft force, requiring the leaft expence to erect, and particularly as affording an increasing degree

Captain Macbride entered the following objection to the third datum, on the fubject of the enemy's force against which the board thought it neceflary to provide.

I cbjest to this datum, becaufe it is founded upon a calculation of a large imaginary force. My idea of a defeent goes only to the probability of an armament that may possibly confit of -- (a certain force which he specifies) which I think fufficient to provide against.

To the queftion, What improvement or alterations, or what other fyftem of defence the board would fuggelt ?

Lieutenant-generals Burgoyne and earl Percy, vice-admiral Millbanke, and major-general Green, flated, that they had none to fuggeft under the circumflances of the data.

Rear-admiral Graves flated, that he had none to fuggeft under the excefs of the data.

Vice-admiral Barrington, rear-admiral lord Hood, captains Hotham, Bowyer, fir Andrew Snape Hammond, and the honourable James Luttrell, ftated, that they thought it more properly belonged to the land officers of this board, than to them, as the minutes of their proceedings will flew, to enter into any fyftem of defence or fortifications, except fuch parts as are intended for a defence against flips of war, and the proposals they have offered for gun-boats.

Captain Macbride flated, that he had no farther improvements to fuggefl; but entered his objections to the proposed fyslem of defence.

Note.—Captain Macbride's objections are omitted, becaule they contain detailed deforiptions of the coaft, roadileads, currents, tides, and bottoms, and auchorage, by no means proper to be divulged. Captain Macbride concludes his objections with these words:

gree of fecurity in the course of their crection, in to much as that, if any given portion of them was compleated, and the remainder unitnished, yet even that part fo compleated would afford a great deal of additional ftrength. In support of his third polition, he urged, that the dock-yards being thus protected, the navy would confequently be unfettered, and left at liberty to act as occasion might require, in whatever part

I am therefore of opinion that no new works are at prefent necessary to be erected at Plymouth.

On the board having declared it to be their unanimous opinion, that no member is precluded, by the data agreed to by the board, from fuggetting any other fythem of defence, on those or any other data, for the confideration of the board, in anfwer to the question contained in the 23d head under his majefty's instructions;

The following provifo was added: But we do not think ourielves required, as individuals, by his majefty's inftructions, or any queftions under them, to produce any other fyilem, or other data.

Rear-admiral Graves, in affenting to the article of the report expressing the full confidence of the board, that the providing an additional security to the dock-yard at Plymouth is in no refpect inconfiftent with the neceffiry support or the navy ; to avoid being milunderstood, defired to explain himfelf by the following provifo :

I perfectly agree with the reft of the board, as to the importance of the royal navy towards the fafety and profperity of this maritime and infular kingdom; but would not have it im; lied, that I think any new fyilem of additional land fortifications for the fecurity of Plymouth necessary.

Lieutenant-generals Burgoyne and earl Percy, vice-admiral Millbanke, rearadmira. Graves, and captain fir John Jatvis, c. figning the report, beg leave to represent to your melefty as follows :

That our proceedings have been founded upon the supposition of the whole fleet being absent (for a cut in time) as mentioned in the fecond datum, and therefore that the enemy may bring over an army (of the force mentioned in the third datum) with an artillery proportionate to an attack on Portfinouth or Plymouth, having (a certain tim.) to act in, uninterrupted by the British flect, as mentioned in the third datam : the bare poffibility of fuch an event we do not pretend to deny; but how far it is probable that the whole British fleet may be fent on any fer. vice requiring to long an abfence, at a time when the enemy is prepared to invade this country with (a force as that mentioned in the third datum) we must humbly leave to your metalty's fuperior wildom; and therefore, whether it is necellary, in confequence of such a fuppolition, to creft works of fo expensive a nature as those proposed, and which require fuch large garritons to defend them.

part of the world their prefence might be most necessary. Whoever, he faid, turned in his mind the events of the last war, would, he was fure, be convinced of the great benefit that might be drawn from our fleets being enabled to act in fuch a manner; and he particularly vice. In proof of his last position, alluded to that period when the French were hovering upon our coafts, and when the renown of defending and relieving Gibraltar would have been loft, but for fome accidental circumitances that luckily at that moment fecured us from the danger of an attack at home, and enabled the fleet under lord Howe to fail on that important ferthat the fortifications in question would reduce our standing army, he faid, that if, in cafe of a threatened

Lieutenant-generals Burgoyne and earl Percy, on agreeing to the erection of new works, and to the fyttem of detached forts being the most proper for the prefervation of the dock-yard at Portfmouth, entered the following provifo : We approve of the lyftem of detached works, and we agree to the above, under the circumstances fettled in the data, provided the expence to be incurred shall not exceed fuch fums as the flate can afford to grant for thefe purpofes, and that the number of troops supposed to be allotted by the fourth datum, can be spared for the defence of Portfmouth, confiftently with the general defence of the kingdom.

> (Signed) J. Burgoyne, Percy.

To which proviso the reft of the land officers, members of this board, think it their duty to add :

That we the under-written humbly defire that it may be underflood by your majefty, that we never entertained an idea that any expense to be incurred thould exceed fuch fums as the ftate could afford for thele purpoles, as we apprehend was fully flated in our fecond datum; or that we meant to recommend works requiring a greater number of troops to defend than could be fpared for the defence of Portfmouth, confidently with the general defence of the kingdom.

On the contrary, the works we recommend appear to us to be calculated upon the most acconomical principles, and to require the smallest number of troops peffible to anther the purpole of effectually lecuring your malefty's dock-yards at Portfinouth and Plymouth. We conceive that fuch numbers can be spared for this purpole; we confider fuch protection to be an effential object for the fafety of the flate, and intimately connected with the general defence of the kingdom; but we do not confider it to be our province minicely to enter into a confideration of the abilities of the flate to provide the necessary supplies for this purpose.

invation, we fhould truft only to our flanding army, and remain without fortifications, there would be a neceffity of augmenting to a most enormous degree that army, on which the whole fafety of the kingdom was to reft; whereas, if it was affifted with fortifications, a much fmaller force would be fufficient, it being abfurd to contend that any number of troops, independent of fortifications, were able to defend a place better than the fame number, afifted by fortifications. But it had been, he faid, already proved, that the plan proposed for the security of the dock-vards was the beft that could be devifed, and was capable of defence by the fmallest number of troops; it would therefore follow of courfe, that the fortifications in queftion would reduce the flanding army to the loweft poffible number that the circumflances of the cafe would admit of. This laft argument he hoped would compleatly remove those alarms that prevailed both within and beyond the walls of the house, from a mistaken idea that the measure was unconflicutional in its tendency, by laying the foundation for a flanding army, and diverting into an ufelefs and dangercus channel those refources which fhould firengthen our navy. He concluded with declaring, that he viewed it as a naval queffion, and as fuch it ought to be confidered, becaufe while it gave fecurity to the vital springs and fources of our marine, by protecting the dock-yards, to far from rendering an increase of the military force of the kingdom neceflary, as fome gentictien, from a laudable jealoufy of the standing army, and from a natural and zealous regard for the conflication, had teen led to imagine, it would actually tend to remove the necessfity of keeping up to large a military effablifhment as otherwife must be maintained.

Such were the leading arguments by which the refolution was fupported. The other fpeakers in favour of it were lord Hood, the honourable captain Berkeley, the honourable James Luttrell, captain Bowyer, Sir C. Middleton, Mr. J. Hawkins Browne, and lord Mahon.

In opposition to the measure, it was moved as an amendment, by Mr. Baflard, and feconded by Sir W. Lemon, one of the members for the county of Cornwall, to leave out of the refolution all the words from the word "houfe" to the end of the queftion; and to infert, " that " fortifications on fo extensive a " plan as propeded by the board, " are inexpedient."

This amendment was defended by Mr. Wallwyn, general Burgoyne, captain Macbride, colonel Barré, Mr. Courtenay, the honcurable Charles Marfham, Mr. Windham, Mr. Fox, lord North, and Mr. Sheridan.

The fpeech of the laft-mentioned gentleman on this occation was the jubject of much admiration; and indeed, independent of fuch arguments as were peculiar to itfelf, it appears to have comprehended every other which was made use of in contradiction to the proposed plan of fortifications. His objections to the fiftem were of a two-fold nature ;- first, fuch as went to fnew that it was in itfelf, and in its confequences, dangerous and inimical to the conflitution ;-- and fecondly, that fuch were the nature and circumfances of the report made by the board of officers, that the report itself ' itself did not warrant or authorize the fystem. Under the first of these heads he took notice of the arguments that had been used to shew that this fyftem of fortification would actually diminish the standing army in this country, and that, the number of troops being fo diminished, there would be proportionably lefs caufe for conftitutional jealoufy. The pofition that this fystem of defence by fortifications could, under any circumftances whatever, have the effect of reducing the flanding army, he utterly denied. But even allowing that fuch fortifications would lessen the standing army, it did not follow, he faid, as a conclusion, that there would be lefs caufe for conflitutional jealousy; that when we talked of a conflitutional jealoufy of the military power of the crown, what was the real object we pointed our suspicion at, but that it was in the nature of kings to love power, and in the conflitution of armies to obey kings ?- That whenever we fpoke of a conflictational jealoufy of the army, it was upon a supposition that the unhappy time might come, when a prince might be mifled by evil counfellors, and that an army might be found who would fupport their military head in an attempt upon the rights and liberties of their country .- The peffible existence of this cafe, and the probable coincidence of thefe circumftances, was in contemplation whenever an argument was admitted upon the fubject; otherwife we burlefqued and derided the wifdom of our anceftors in the provisions of the bill of rights, and made a mere mockery of the falutary and facred referve with which for a flort and limited period we annually entrufted the executive magidrate with the necessary defence of the country.

This plain flatement being the cafe, it was not merely to the number of foldiers a king might have, that we were to look. The jet and subflance of the question was, in which of the two fituations, the one with, the other without the proposed fortifications, would fuch a mifled king and his counfellors find themfelves in a state of the greatest military force and preparation, and most likely to command and to receive a military fupport? In this point of view, would it be argued that these fortreffes, which were to become capable of refifting the fiege of a foreign enemy landed in force, would not ferve as a fufficient ftrength in the hands of the crown, when the enemy was his people? Again, would no streis be given to the great important diffinction between troops felected and feparated from their fellow citizens in garrifons and forts, and men living feattered and entangled in all the common duties and connections of their countrymen? Was this an argument of no weight, when applied to the militia, who were to form a part of these garrisons? or would it. even for a moment, be pretended, that men, under fuch circumstances. and in fuch difciplined habits, were not a thousand times more likely to despife the breath of parliament. and to lend themtelves to the active purposes of tyranny and ambition, than the loofe and unconnected hodies which exift, even with jealoufy, under the-prefent regulations? It was unnecetiary to prets the diffinetion; the fact was, that those flrong military holds, if maintained as they muft be in peace by full and duciplined garrifons; if well provided, vided, and calculated to ftand regular fieges, as the prefeat plan profelled; and if extended to all the objects to which the fystem must inevitably lead, whether they were to be confidered as inducements to tempt a weak prince to evil views, or as engines of power in cafe of an zetual repture, would in truth promile ten-fold the means of curbing and fubduing the country that could be flated to arife even from doubling the prefent military eftablishment; with this extraordinary aggravation attending the folly of confenting to fuch a fystem, that those very naval ftores and magazines, the effectual prefervation of which was the pretence for these unassailable fortreffes, would in that cafe become a pledge and hoftage in the hands of the crown, which, in a country circumstanced as this was, must enfure an unconditional fubmiffion to the most extravagant claims which defpotifm could dictate.

He next adverted to the arguments which had been used to fliew that the prefent fyllem of fortification would leffen the flanding army; the fallacy of which he faid was evident, in fuppofing that the fythem of defence by fortifications was needfarily to ftop, when Portfmouth and Plymouth fhould become fecured, and that the reafoning upon which the extensive works for these places were juffified, would not apply to any other parts of the kingdom, whereever their importance called for defence, or their fituation exposed them to attack. The fhortest method of refuting this idea, was fimply to fuppofe the fame board of officers, acting under the fame instructions, and deliberating under the fame data, going a circuit round the coaft of the kingdom, and directed to report upon the various places in their progrefs, and let any perfon fairly consider the fuppolitions under which they make their prefent report, and then helitate to confefs, that they must of necessfity recommend a fimilar plan of defence, proportionable to the importance of every place to which their attention was directed.

Mr. Sheridan now proceeded to examine fo much of the report made by the board of officers as had been laid before the houfe; which, he argued, was framed in fuch a manner, and under fuch circumftances, as by no means fanctioned or warranted the plan under their confideration. Had the board been left to their own free and unfettered judgment, and had they then reported, as their decided and unqualified opinion, that the fystem proposed by the mafter general of the ordnance was a measure worthy of the wifdom of parliament to adopt, he fhould, he faid, have acquiefced in their determination; but to flow that this was not the cafe, he fhould appeal to, and argue from the report itfelf. First, he observed, that, mutilated as the state of it was, it was still evident that, fo far from its having received the unanimous fanction of the board, there was good reafon to believe, from the reference which was made to the minutes of the naval officers, (the refult of which was withheld) that those minutes contained a condemnation of the plan. He did not think it would be argued, that the refult of those minutes could not be communicated, becaufe they were mixed with fuch other matters of intelligence as it might be dangerous to reveal; fince a fufiicien:

cient degree of ingenuity had been thewn in the manner of making the extracts from the report; and it would prove extraordinary indeed, if, wherever the judgment was unfavourable, it should have been fo blinded and complicated with matter of detail and dangerous discussion, that no chemical process in the ordnance laboratory could possibly feparate them; while, on the contrary, every approving opinion, like a fubtile oily fluid, floated at the top at once, and the clumfielt clerk was capable of prefenting it to the house pure and untinged by a fingle particle of the reafon or information which produced it.

Secondly, he contended that the opinion of the land officers was founded upon hypothetical and conditional fuggestions, and upon fuch data as the mafter general had propoled to them; the truth or probahility of which Juggestions and data the board invariably and unanimoufly refufed to authorife or make themfelves refpontible for. This circumstance, he laid, deferved particular attention, since the report had been to artfully framed and managed as to warrant a contrary affertion, namely, that the board had acceded to the trath or probability of the data themfelves. In fpeaking of thefe data, Mr. Sheridan ufed much wit and ingenious raillery, at the expense of the mafter general. He faid that his grace deferved the warment panegyrics for the firiking proofs which he had given of his genius as an engineer, which appeared even in the planning and condructing of the report in question ; the professional ability of the matter general those confpicuouily there, as it would upon our coafts: he had made an argument of poils, and conducted his reafoning upon principles of trigonometry as well as logic. There were certain detached data like advanced works to keep the enemy at a diffance from the main object in debate; ftrong provisions covered the flanks of his affertions; his very queries were in calemates; no impression therefore was to be made on this fortrels of sophistry by defultory obfervations, and it was necessary to fit down before it, and atfail it by regular approaches. It was fortunate however, he faid, to observe, that notwithstanding all the tkill employed by the noble and literary engineer, his mode of defence on paper was open to the fame objection which had been urged against his other fortifications, that, if his adverlary got peffettion of one of his pefts, it became firength against him, and the means of jubduing the whole line of his argument.

Lailly, he argued, that the data themfelves were founded upon a fupposition of events fo desperate and improbable, as would, were they to take effect, not only produce inminent danger to Portfno th and Plymouth, but equally fo to every other part of the country, and in fact the actual conquelt of the idend - Under the circumstances of the dota, it was necessary to Suppose literally as follows:- " The " ablence of the whole British flect " for the space of three months, while an army of thirty or forty. " thouland men was ready on the "enemy's coaft to invade this " country, that easiny to chule " their point of landing, to land " and encamp with neary artil-· lery, " lery, and every neceffury for a " fiege, while no force in Great " Britain could be collected in " lefs than two months to op-" pofe them."

Admitting first as a fact, what was not at all certain, namely, that the enemy should decide to attack Portfmouth and Plymouth, inflead of firiking at the heart of the empire, yet it did not then follow, he faid, that thefe only objects were effectually fecured and provided for; fince, in the fift place, it had not yet been made out that the enemy might not either land or march to the eastward of Plymouth, where no defence was yet intended to be conthruched; and, fecondly, as the whole question turned upon the supposition of our being inferior at fea, we must either, upon the return of our inferior fleet, truft to its beating the fuperior fleet of the enemy, or the confequence muft be fatal to the befieged dockvards-for it was expressly flated in the report, that the defence of Portfmouth and Plymouth was calculated only egainst the force, and for the time stated in the data. But by fuppolition, the enemy was to have the superior fleet; and should the inferior fleet either be abfent or be best, they would then, being mafters of the tea, obvioufly have it in their power to recruit their own army, to continue the flege, and to keep the other expoled parts of the kingdom in such check and plann, as thereby to prevent the peffibility of our affembling a torce fufficient to raile it. Frem hence it would follow of course, that whenever the army of the energy fhould by these means either exceed the number fuppofed, or that the time fhould be prolonged beyond the period calculated in the data, the whole of this effectual security would vanish under the very reasons given for its fupport, and we fhould have prepared a firong hold in our own country for the enemy, which, from the very circumfances under which he was fuppofed to have taken it, he would be enabled for ever to maintain.

After a long difcussion of the fubject, the house divided on the original motion, as moved by Mr. Pitt: Ayes, 169; Noes, 169. The numbers being thus equal, the speaker, as is usual upon such occafions, was called upon to give his casting vote, which he gave against the original motion.

An alteration in-March 20th. troduced into the mutiny bill, for the purpose of subjecting officers who held commissions by brevet to military law, was flrongly opposed in both houses of parliament. It appears that the earlieft matiny bills included every officer " muffered or in pay as an officer, or on half-pay." The inclusion of the last defeription of officers occafioned in those times fome jealoufy and uncafinels without doors, as an unneceffary extension of the military law, and was the subject of frequent debates in both houses of parliament; and in the year 1748 that part of the claufe was omitted, and has been left out of the mutiny bill ever fince. In the prefent bill, inflead of the word " muftered " the word " commissioned " was inferted, by which alteration all those officers who had commissions by brevet, although out of the fervice, were made fubicet to the regulations of the act.

The general ground on which this this alteration was supported, was, that though fuch officers received no pay from the crown, yet as they might poffibly be invefted with command, it was neceflary they should be made subject to be tried by courts martial, in cafe of milbehaviour while in command; and that there were also many other military officers who were not multered, fuch as governors, lieutenant-governors, &c. who might eventually exercise command; and that it was highly reafonable that they fhould, on that account, become amenable to military law; and laftly, two particular inftances, which had lately occurred, were alledged as proofs of the expediency of the measure propofed :-- col. Stuart, a major-general by brevet in the East Indies, had in that quality taken upon him the command of the army in the fettlement in which he was upon fervice, and had nevertheless not been deemed liable to be tried by a court-martial, had any part of his conduct required that he fhould be tried. The fecond inftance was that of gen. Rofs, in which, upon a reference to the judges, they were unanimoully of opinion, that officers holding commissions by brevet were not hable to be tried by a court-martial.

In reply to thele observations, it was urged, that the whole system of martial law, as it infringed upon the natural and conflictutional rights of the subject, was only defensible upon the strict ground of necessity, and ought therefore, in times of peace more especially, to be narrowed if possible, instead of being extended. That the general principle, as recognized both in the theory and practice of our conflicttion, was, that military law should be confined to actual military fervice alone. That in ancient times when every man bore arms, and was liable to be called forth, military law was exercifed upon every man while he was in actual fervice, but no longer. Thus those princes who had little power in their dominions, in refpect to civil government, enjoyed and exercifed almost an unlimited authority when at the head of their fubjects, collected and embodied as an army, which again always ceafed with the occation that made it necessary. That in our times, the militia were under military law when embodied as a militia, but were freed from it after they returned into the mass of the people, and the character of the foldier was funk in that of the citizen. That the officers on half-pay, though at first included in the mutiny act, had been exempted from its operation by the deliberate voice of both houses of parliament : circumstances which clearly proved, that the prevalent idea in all ages had been to confine military law to actual military fervice.

It was further urged, that there was a peculiar hardfhip and injustice in subjecting men in civil life, and who derived no emolument from the rank which they held in the army, to be tried by courtsmartial, not only for offences at this time known and defined in the articles of war to be military offences, but for offences as yet un. known, which his majefty had the power hereafter to create. That the all expressly ordered that the artilles of war should be read twice in every month at the head of every regiment in the army; that this measure was doubtless thought neceffary, for the purpole of making then them familiarly known to all who were liable to be affected by them, and was therefore a clear proof that the mutiny act, under which the king derives his authority to make fuch articles of war as he pleafed, was never defigned to be extended to brevet officers, or officers on half pay : and that at leaft, if the innovation proposed thould be perfitted in, those gentlemen thould be apprized of their being about to be made fubject to trial by court-martial for a variety of offences, which at prefent, in their civil fituation, were not offences.

In addition to thefe arguments, it was also remarked, that the preamble to the mutiny act confined the flanding army to a limited number of men, to be paid by the public; and that the propoled alteration would fallify the preamble, by enabling the executive government to exercile military authority over an additional tody of men not in the pay of the public. In fine, both houses were called upon not to fuffer that jealoufy to be laid afleep, with which pailiament, ever fince a flanding army in peace was first suffered to exift, had always regarded it: and to take care left, under protence of providing against fanciful inconveniences, they did not connive at a ferious attack upon the most important principles of the conflitution.

In the houfe of lords, the bill was oppofed in two fubfequent debates, with great elequence and ability, by the earl of Carlifle, lord Storment, and lord Leughborough; the first of whom proposed, in order to obviate the difficulty of a brevet officer's fucceeding to command without being amenable to military Law, that a claufe faculd be added, enacting, that brevet officers fhould not take command but by virtue of a letter of service, or fome fpecial commission from his majefty. This propofal not being accepted, lord Stormont moved, that inflead of the word " commissioncd " thefe words fhould be inferted, " maftered, or called by proper authority into fervice ;" this amendment, he conceived, would do away the objections entertained against the proposed innovation, and would furely comprehend all that the executive government could reffibly defire.

The cloufe, as originally framed, was defended by the lord chancellor, chicfly on the ground that all the king's forces, however conffituted, ought to be subject to the fame laws; that the diffinction between an officer by brevet out of fervice, and an officer in actual fervice, was an unfair diffinction with respect to the latter. If gentlemen chofe to have the advantage of military rank, they ought to hold it on the condition of being fubject to military law; and if they difliked that condition, they might eafe themfelves of the grievance by refigning their commissions.

This argument introduced another topic of difcuffion. It was afked, whether an officer might not, in actual fervice, give up his commiffion whenever he pleafed ? It was answered by lord Longhborough, that fuch a refignation was fubject to his majefly's acceptance; and in this opinion the lord chancellor concurred, but added, no minister, under the circumftances deferibed, coald advife his majefly not to accept fech a refignation. On the division there appeared for the original claufe 42, against it 20.

Mr. Pitt's motion with refest to the redustion of the national debt .- Report of a felest committee relative to the annual incent and expenditure of the flate. -Supplies and ways and means for the current year. Bill brought in by Mr. Pitt to form a finking fund of one million annually, to be wefled in commiffioners, and to be applied to the reduction of the rational delt; debates thereon ; refolutions moved by Mr. Sheridan negatived ; an amendment moved by Mr. Fox, and agreed to without a division ; the Bill ; after both boufes of parliament, and receives the royal affent .- Mr. Pitt's Bill for transferring the duties on wines from the cuftoms to the excise; debates thereon ; a new claufe, moved by Mr. Beaufoy, negatived ; the bill carried up to the house of lords; debates upon it there; passed .- Mr. Pitt's Bill, empowering commissioners to enquire into the flato of, and to Jell, the crossin lands; debates thereon; amenaments moved by Mr. Jelliffe agreed to; the Bill carried up to the lords; debates thereon; corried on a divifion ; protest entered against it .- Bill brought in by Mr. Marsham to extend the difqualifications in Mr. Creave's Bill to perfors bolding places under the navy and ordnance offices; debates thereon; negatived on a diwifion.

M R. Pitt had early in this feffion taken notice of that part of his Majefty's speech which related to the necessity of providing for the diminution of the national debt; he had at the fame time given the houfe to understand, that fuch was the prefent flourishing condition of the revenue, that the annual national income would not only equal the annual national difburfements, but would leave a furplus of confiderable magnitude; this furplus, he faid, he meant to form into a permanent fund, to be constantly and invariably applied to the liquidation of the public debt. In perfuance of this information to the house, and in order to afcertain the amount of the furplus in queffion, Mr. Pitt, previous to his entering into the flate of the finances, or ways and means for the prefent year, moved, " That the feveral accounts and other papers prefented that feffion, relating to the public income and expenditure, be referred to the confideration of a felect committee, and that the faid committee be directed to examine and report to the house, what might be expected to be the annual amount of the income and expenditure in future."

This motion was unanimoufly agreed to, and the felect committee having framed their report, laid it before the houfe on the 21ft of March: Mr. Pitt on the 29th, together with the fupplies and way: and means for the prefent year. brought the confideration of the national debt, and his proposition for the diminution of it, termaily before the houfe.

Before we enter upon this fubject, it may not be amifs to give a fhort abftract of the report in queftion, as the whole jut and fubliance of the arguments and reafoning upon the menfare are founded upon it. The committee prefaced their report with observing, that ' Having proceeded to the confideration deration of the matters referred to them by the houfe, they had arranged feveral papers relating thereto under diffinet heads, containing the different articles of the public income and expenditure.

But that before they entered on the first part of their report, they thought it necessary to premite, that they had confined their examination to the prefent state of the revenue, as it appeared either from the amount actually received in the periods contained in the papers referred to them, or from the best eftimates which they could form of the produce of fuch articles as had not been brought to account in those periods, but compose nevertheles a part of the present income of the The large amount of public. taxes imposed fince the commencement of the late war, in addition to the then fubfifting revenue, the difficulties under which the different branches of our commerce laboured during the continuance of that war, and the great and increafing prevalence of fmuggling, previous to the measures recently adopted for its suppression, appeared to them to render any averages of the amount of the revenue in former periods in a great degree inapplicable to the prefent fituation of the country; on the other hand, they did not think themtelves competent to difcufs the various contingencies which might in future operate to the increase or diminution of the public income: a revenue fo complicated in its nature, and depending fo much on the various branches of an extensive commerce, must always be liable to temporary fluctuations, even although no circumitances fhould arife to occafion any permanent alteration in its produce; that they had therefore judged it proper to fubmit to the wifdom of the house fuch an extenfive confideration, and to flate in their report the prefent amount of the public income, as refulting from the papers before them.

After making all the neceffary deductions, the feveral articles of the annual public receipt and expenditure, from Michaelmas 1784 to Michaelmas 1785, and from January 1785 to January 1786, flood in the report as follows :

¥ UI	•• AAY 111,	L	H]	Mr.

Mr. Pitt opened the fubject at large, and with confiderable ability, claffing and arranging the different articles under their feveral heads with great clearnefs and perfpicuity. He began with obferving, that the neceffity we were under of adopting fome means or other for the diminution of our national debt, was a point upon which all perfons and parties were univerfally agreed; as to the quantum of the fund to be provided, it was as univerfally agreed that not lefs than a million annually ought to be appropriated for that purpofe.

From the report before the houfe, to which he paid the higheft compliments, might be feen, he faid, what were the means of the country for effectuating this purpofe. It exhibited at one view the whole national finance, including the income and the expenditure of the ftate.

The committee had taken two periods from which to afcertain the annual amount of the revenue; the one the year ending at Michaelmas 1785, and the other the year ending on the 5th January 1786. In the former of these periods the whole income was 15,379,1821.; in the latter it was 15,397,4711. The different articles from which this revenue arofe, he obferved, were next to be attended to; they were all branches of the revenue payable yearly, but feveral of them had not yet been received into the exchequer; at the fame time he added, that fuch as had not yet been received, being levied by affefiments, were on that account as capable of being afcertained by fuch affeffments, as if they had been actually received. Thus the net money already received into the exchequer for the year ending Michaelmas 1785 was 11,874,2131.; and for the year ending in January 1786, 12,012,000 l.; the other yearly fums, which he flated from the report, as calculated from affeffments, and yet to be received, would, he faid, when added together, amount, in the year ending at Michaelmas 1785, to 3,365,0001. which, added to the receipts for that year, 11,874,0001. would produce above 15,379,0001. In the fame manner the affeffed yearly fums to be received for the year ending in January 1786 would together make 3,354,0001. which, added to the money actually received in that year, would produce 15,397,000 l. Having thus before them the whole annual income of the flate, it remained to confider what was the annual expenditure; it would appear from the report to amount to This fum, he ob-14,477,0031. ferved, was of a two-fold nature, confilling of fuch items as might be exactly afcertained, and fuch as were fluctuating. Under the first head, he included the interest of the national debt, 9,275,7691; exchequer bills 258,0001.; the civil lift 900,000 l.; the charges on the aggregate fund 64,6001.; and appropriated duties 66,5381.; amounting together to 10,564,907 l. Under the last head he classed the charges of the navy, army, ordnance, militia, and miscellaneous fervices, which from their nature were fluctuating and uncertain. But as the committee, in calculating the expences of the different fervices, had purpofely gone upon the largest and most extensive establishments, it would be but reafonable to suppose that the real expenses would fall fnort of those stated in the report. Thele

These fluctuating expenses of the navy, army, ordnance, militia, and miscellaneous fervices, the report had flated at 3,913,2741. which, added to the fum of 10,564,9071. under the first head of permanent expences, makes the whole of the expenditure 14,478,1811.; which, deducted from 15,397,000 l. the amount of the income, left a furplus, of about 900,000 l. towards the discharge of the national debt. But in order to make up the remaining 100,000 l. it would be necessary to levy fresh taxes to that amount, to compleat what feemed to be univerfally received as the fum which ought to be applied to the purpofe in question, viz. one million annually. This he meant to do by adding one penny per gallon to the duty on spirits, as it now flood, and which had been reduced 5 d. per gallon on the old duty by a late act of parliament. This tax he fhould calculate at 60 or 70,000 l. per ann. He should next propose an alteration in the mode of meafuring deals and battens, with a view of correcting certain abuses, which at prefent tended to defraud the revenue. From this regulation, he faid, 20 or 30,0001. per annum would arife to the public. Laftly, he should propose a tax on hair powder and pomatums, which might bring in from 15 to 30,000 l. per annum. Thus, agreeable to the itatement made in the report, there would be a clear furplus of at least a million annually, for a finking fund, to be applied to the reduction of the national debt.

Mr. Pitt next proceeded to obferve, that the amount of the cxpenditure, as flated in the report, with respect to the navy, army, and ordnance, although it was large and ample, as calculated for times of peace, and as they were to fland in future, yet that it fell infinitely fhort of what was the actual expenditure for those establishments for the prefent year, or what would be fo for two or three years to come. The effects of the late tedious and expensive war, he faid, would be felt for fome time longer, and the necessary claims it had left on the public purfe were fuch as it was wife and politic to comply with; thus, for instance, the naval halfpay and penfion lifts were unavoidably much increased, and a number of thips, which were now on the flocks, were to be compleated, in order to fave the expense that already had been incurred by them, and which otherwife, from the total decay of the veffels, would be loft. By fuch means the allowance for the navy, which according to the report was only 1, Sco, cool. amounted in the prefent year to 2,400,000 I. In the fame manner the exceedings of the army, arifing from the fame enormous increase of the half-pay lift, and penfion lift, amounted to 260,000 l. over and above the fum allowed for that fervice in the report. The whole of thefe exceedings in the army and navy, on their prefent effablithment, above what was flated in the report as the amount of their permanent expenditure, was above 750,000 l. This was a fum, which from its very nature would gradually diminish, and in time be reduced to nothing. Supposing it to last four years, it would then be equal to a fum of 3,000,000 l. For this fum a provision was necesfary; but he added, fuch were the extraordinary refources of the country, although not immediately capable of being claffed under any certain head of revenue, that it would be unneceffary to lay any fresh barthens on the people for that purpose.

Mr. Pitt took this opportunity of entering at large into the actual and probable refources of the country. He first stated the furplus on the feveral funds, and the army favings, at 450,0001. the arrears ftill due from paymaiters at 1,000,000l.; a lottery, if it fhould be thought proper to have one, at 140,0001.: a great deal, he faid, was to be expected from the increase of the cultoms, which had been uniform ever fince the means adopted for the fuppreffion of imuggling. Other regulations relative to the cuft ms, he faid, were now in agitation; alfo fuch as respected the wine duty, and above all a plan for the confolidation of the cuitoms. From all thefe regulations, there was but little doubt, but that the growing refources of the country, and the contingent receipts of the different fums he had mentioned, would be more than fufficient, without a loan, to discharge the exceedings which our establishments, during the next three or four years, would amount to, bevond their permanent level, as stated in the report. But if it should be otherwife, he neverthelefs was of opinion, that money should rather be borrowed for the difcharge of those extraordinary demands, than that the inflitution of the fund in queftion fhould be postponed, or infringed upon at any time after it was eitablished. Mr Pitt next proceeded to explain the mode he meant to adopt, in order to infure the due application of this fund to its deftined object : he propofed, he faid, to vest in a certain number of commissioners the full power of disposing of it in the purchase of stock for the public in their own names. These commissioners should receive the annual million by quarterly payments of 250,0001. to be issued out of the exchequer before any other money, except the interest of the national debt itself; by these provisions, the fund would be secured, and no deficiencies in the national revenues could affect it, but such must be separately provided for by parliament.

The accumulated compound intereft on a million yearly, together with the annuities that would fall into that fund, would, he faid, in twenty-eight years, amount to fuch a fum as would leave a furplus of four millions annually, to be applied, if neceflary, to the exigencies of the flate. In appointing the commissioners he should, he faid, endeavour to chufe perfons of fuch weight and character as corresponded with the importance of the commission they were to execute. The fpeaker of the house of commons, the chancellor of the exchequer, the mafter of the rolls, the governor and deputy governor of the bank of England, and the accountant general of the high court of chancery, were perfons who, from their feveral fituations, he fhould think highly proper to be of the number.

The next point that Mr. Pitt confidered was the jupplies and ways and means for the prefent year, which he faid were in fuch a flate as would enable the houfe to put the plan for the reduction of the national debt into immediate execution.

Mr. Pitt stated the whole of the fupplies, including a fum of z 10,000 l. granted granted in aid of the civil lift, at 12,477,0861. The fum of 210,0001. in aid of the civil lift, was to difcharge certain outstanding exchequer bills to the amount of 180,000 l. for which the civil lift flood mortgaged, and about 30,0001. additional debt, which it had incurred during the laft year. The aways and means to fatisfy thefe demands Mr. Pitt stated at 13,362,4801. which included 5,000.0001. by exchequer bills, to be iffued for the purpole of paying off certain exchequer bills to the fame amount, which already made part of the supplies for the current year. Agreeably to this calculation, there would, after deducting the amount of the supplies from the ways and means, remain a This fum, he furplus of 885,3941. faid, would be more than fufficient to put his proposed plan into immediate execution. It would allow 250,000l. a quarter to be issued to the commissioners for the three fucceeding quarters of the current year. The amount of this would be 750,0001. which would leave a balance for the beginning of the following year of 135,3941.

Mr. Pitt, before he fat down, entered into a fhort recapitulation of the different points he had difcuffed.-First, That the yearly income of the flate exceeded the permanent level of its expenditure, by a fum Next, that this fum of 900,000 l. would be increased to a million by means in no wife burthensome to the people .- Thirdly, That altho' the prefent establishment exceeded in certain inftances the fame effablifhments as stated in the report of the fe'eft committee, yet there were ample refources, and contingent and outstanding receipts, fufficient to everbalance fuch exceffes, without having recourse to any fresh taxes: -And laftly, that the ways and means for the prefent year would be fufficient to furnish the fupplies, together with the fum of 250,0001. to be applied quarterly towards the eftablithment of the new fund; and, after all, would leave a confiderable balance to be carried to the next year. Mr. Pitt concluded by moving, " That the fum of one million be annually granted to certain commiffioners, to be by them applied to the purchase of stocks, towards difcharging the public debt of this country; which money fhall arife out of the furpluffes, exceffes, and overplus monies composing the fund, commonly called the finking fund."

The policy of the principle upon which this motion was founded, viz. the policy of making the income of the flate fo far exceed its expenditure as to leave a confiderable furplus towards the liquidation of the public debt, was on all fides univerfally acknowledged, and it was accordingly carried in the affirmative without a division.

At the fame time feveral objections were flated by Sir Grey Cooper, Mr. Fox, Mr. Sheridan, and Mr. Huffey, to what they termed the infufficiency, and in fome inflances the impolicy, of the mode which Mr. Pitt had adopted to accomplifh fo great and fo defirable an end.

These objections were of a twofold nature: 1th, Such as tended to show that the supposed excess of goo,ocol. in the national income over its expenditure, arose from false and mistaken calculations and conclusions in the report of the select committee, and such as the real state of the finances of the country by no means warranted : 2d, Such as went to the purpoled mode of applying that excels or furplus, provided it exifted. The fubflance of the different arguments made ufe of in fupport of the objections which come under the first of thefe heads were as it were concentered in a feries of refolutions moved by Mr. Sheridan on the 4th of May, and whill the measure was in its passing through the house.

Thefe refolutions, which were negatived without a division, were, Iff, " That the expected annual amount of the national income flated in the report of the committee, appeared in no respect to have been calculated upon the average receipts of a number of years, but was fixed at the amount of the produce of one year only, with the addition of the probable increase of the new taxes: zd, That it appeared, that the account of the annual expenditure, as oppofed to the amount of the income fo calculated, was not a flatement of the prefent exifting expenditure, or of that which must exist for some years to come, but was formed from the probable reductions, which it was alledged would have taken place in the profpect of permanent peace towards the end of the year 1791 : 3d, That the different branches of the revenue, in the period upon which the fature was calculated, appeared to have been fingularly productive, particularly in the cuftoms : 4th, That it did not appear that any means had been taken, or information called for, in order to afcertain whether fuch an increase of revenue had arisen from caufes which were likely to have a permanent operation, or otherwife; and that fuch an investigation was indifpenfably neceffary : 5th, That the uncertainty of effimating by fuch a criterion the expected future produce of the revenue, was still more evident upon a comparison of the quarter-day ending the fifth of April last with the fame quarter in the preceding year upon which the future income was calculated; by which it appeared that the amount of the latter quarter was inferior in the article of cuftoms by the fum of 188,2151. 135, 4d. to the former : 6th, That in the faid report there were certain articles of receipt erroneoufly flated as proper to be added to the future annual income, and other articles of expence erroneoufly omitted to be added to the expenditure: 7th, That the fums voted and to be voted for the prefent year confiderably exceeded 15,397,471 l.: 8th, That the means by which the deficiency was to be made good arole from aids and debts that belonged to the prefent year only : 9th, That there was no furplus income now exifting applicable to the reduction of the national debt : 10th, That a furplus income in the enfuing quarters could arife only in the renewal of a loan for an extraordinary million, borrowed upon exchequer bills in the last year, and which it would be unneceffary to make but for the purpose of fecuring that furplus : 11th, That an extraordinary increase of exchequer bills was an inexpedient anticipation of that affiftance which government might receive in the event of a peculiar emergency : 12th, That the faving to the public upon the interest of money borrowed in this way was rendered precarious by the necessity of the more fpeedy iffuing of fuch bills, in order that the object for which the loan was made might be effectually answered : 13th, That, admitting that by the foregoing means the expected furplus would arite upon the whe three enfuing quarters, it appeared, that there would then be an interval of nearly four years, before the commencement of that permanent peace eftablishment, which was to furnish in the reduction of its fervices the expected furplus : 14th, That in this period it appeared from the vouchers annexed to the report and other papers, that a fum amounting to 4,000,0001. belides 2,000,0001. due to the bank, would be wanted above the flated annual income : Finally, that for this fum of 6,000,000 l. there appeared to be no adequate provision or refource."

In fupport of fuch objections as were made to the mode of applying the supposed furplus, it was urged, that fuch part of it as rendered the fum appropriated unahienable under any circumstances whatever, was highly impolitic; that it tended to tie up and fetter the revenues of the country, when their application to some particular purpose might be of the highest importance. Allo, that the obligation to pay the money was only of a general nature, and not an obligation to individuals. In the latter cafe the pledge was held facred, and itood upon as fure a footing as the acknowledgment of the national debt itielf; whereas a general obligation was liable to be annulled by parliament, upon the flighteft pretence even of conveniency :- Laftly, that the prefent large amount of unfunded exchequer bills, which were to be charged on the aids of next feffion, would become a great and ferious evil, as they would oblige the commissioners, from the quantity that would be at market, to buy their flock dear, and fell it cheap, and confequently defeat the very plan in question.

In fupport of the first of these objections, Mr. Fox, on the day for reconfidering the report of the committee on this bill, moved a claufe to impower the commillioners therein named to accept fo much of any future loan as they should have cash belonging to the public in their hands to pay for. This, he faid, would obviate the great objection he had to the prefent bill, on account of its making the finking fund unalienable under any circumstances whatever ; it would relieve that diffrefs the country would otherwife be under, when, on account of a war, it might be necessary to raife a new loan : whenever that fhould be the cafe, his opinion was, that the minister should not only raise taxes sufficiently productive to pay the interest of the loan, but also sufficient to make good to the finking fund whatsoever had been taken from it.

If therefore, for inftance, at any future period a loan of fix millions was propoled, and there was at that time one million in the hands of the commiffioners, in fuch cafe they ihould take a million of the lean, and the bonus or double at there upon fhould be received by them for the public. Thus government would only have five millions to borrow initead of fix, and, from fuch a mode of proceeding, he faid, it was evident great benefit would arile to the public.

This claufe was brought up by Mr. Fox, and received by Mr. Pitt with the ftrongeft marks of approbation. Another claufe, enabling the commiffioners named in the bill to continue purchafing flock for the public when at or above par, unlefs otherwife directed by parliament, was moved by Mr. Pultney, and carried. The object of this claufe was to throw upon parliament the refponsibility of giving fresh inflructions to the commissioners, whenever the funds should be at or above par, or in case of its neglecting to do so, to render the confequences imputable to such neglect.

The bill, with these additional clauses, was read a third time on the 15th of May, and carried up to the lords, where it also passed without meeting with any material opposition, and asterwards received the royal assent.

May 22d, On the 22d of May, 1786. On the 22d of May, Mr. Pitt prefented a bill duties on wines from the cuftoms to the excife.—This was one of the plans he had in view for increasing the revenue, and which he had before given the house notice of, when he proposed the finking fund of a million annually.

The prefent amount of duties on wines, he faid, was at this moment lefs, by 280,000l. per annum, than what had been the amount in the middle of the laft century; and yet at the fame time there was no doubt, but that the confumption of that article was confiderably increased fince that period.

This defalcation he attributed to two caufes: first, the fraudulent importation of large quantities of foreign wine without paying the duties; and fecondly, which he looked upon as the principal caufe, the fale of a fpurious liquor under the name of wine, made at home. Thefe caufes, ne faid, would be removed by the operation of the prefent bill; which, by impofing duties upon the fpurious equal to thofe on the genuine commodity, would either fupprefs the former, as was mo& likely, and thereby increasfug the demand for foreign wines, not only increafe the revenue, but extend in return the fale of the various articles of our home trade; or it would oblige the fpurious commodity to pay the fame duties as the genuine, and not fuffer both the confumer and the revenue to be cheated at the fame time. The bill would likewife infure the payment of all duties imposed on such foreign wines as should hereafter be imported.

The carrying this improvement into execution by means of the excife laws, Mr. Pitt was aware, would be regarded with an eye of jealoufy by the houfe; but the bill fpecially provided againft any general extenfion of the excife laws, and only permitted the officers of excife to enter the cellars and warehoufes of fuch as dealt in wine, and not the dwelling-houfes even of thofe.

The bill was objected to upon two grounds: first, on the difficulty of applying the excise laws to such a commodity as wine; and secondly, on the impolicy of ever extending those laws beyond their present limits.

Under the first head it was contended, that the practice of gauging, fo applicable to brewers, was perfectly incompatible with respect to such an article as wine; that the continual increase and diminution of the trader's stock would baffle the endeavours of the officers to keep a regular account of it, and yet the whole system of excise regulation was founded on that principle.

But the objections which arole from the very nature and operation of the excife laws themfelves were much more warmly infifted upon. The mode of trial adopted by those laws, with respect to offences comi mitted mitted against them, were reprobated, as foreign and abhorrent to the law of the land. It was urged that the commissioners of the excise were themfelves the fole judges between the officer informing and the fuppofed offender : that the informer was concerned in the conviction, as he had by law one half of the commodity forfeited. Added to this, the proceedings were fo fummary, that only three days were allowed for the appearance of perfons fummoned to answer before the commissioners: that the particulars of the charge itself were not fpecified in the fummons, which might be left with a fervant or a child, or in the key-hole of the door. Under these circumftances it was stated to be very poffible that the accufed might be condemned without knowing that he was to be tried; and the execution of the fentence might be the first notice he had of the charge.

In fupport of thefe objections, and in order to obviate as much as pofible the evils which were involved in the execution of the excife laws, Mr. Beaufoy propofed, as an amendment, " to give the " fubject, in all cafes of an in-" formation exhibited in purfu-" ance of the bill in queftion, an " optional right of being tried by " a jury of his peers."

This amendment was oppofed by Mr. Pitt, and on a division negatived by a majority of 65—the numbers being for it 30, against it 95. The bill, without receiving any material alterations, was read a third time on the 29th of June, and carried.

In its pullage through the houfe of lords it met with a confiderable degree of opposition from lord

Loughborough, who, in addition to what had been urged against the general principle of the bill, attacked with a peculiar degree of feverity a claufe which had been introduced into the bill whilft in the committee. The purport of this claufe was, to prohibit the jury, in cafe of any fuit commenced against an officer of the excife for improper feizure, and the officer being able to fhew a probable caufe for fuch feizure, to grant the plaintiff a verdict, exclufive of the value of the things feized, of more than two-pencedamages, or any cofts of fuit, or to inflict a fine that should exceed one shilling. This, his lordthip faid, rendered nugatory every appeal made to the laws of the land for redrefs. As to the term a probable caule, false information was a probable caufe, and that might continually be afthus the figned : rights and powers of juries were infringed. and they were made mere cyphers: the excifeman was placed beyond their jurifdiction, and might laugh both at them and the courts in Weitminster-hall. In the course of his fpeech he particularly addreffed himfelf to the earl of Camden, as a perfon who had ever defended the rights of juries, and without changing his former opinion on the fubject, could not acquiefce in the claufe in question. Lord Camden, in return, confessed that the clause was far from meeting with his approbation; but as any alteration would deftroy the bill for the prefent feffion, he fhould rather give way to the claufe in queition than fet afide the whole bill, which would be the cafe if any amendment took place.

The bill afterwards paffed without a division.

Mr. Pitt, on the zoth of June, in confequence of a previous mediage from his majefty to both houses of parliament, moved, " That leave " be given to bring in a bill for " appointing commiffioners to en-" quire into the flate and condi-" tion of the woods, forefts, and " land revenues, belonging to the " crown." The bill was read a first and fecond time without having any particular notice taken of it, or at all challenging the attention of the houfe. Upon its being reported on the 29th of June, Mr. Jolliffe strongly objected to its further progress. The commissioners appointed by the bill were, he faid, to continue in their office during the exifience of the bill itfelf, which was for three years, without being removable by his majesty, or by address or petition of parliament. The appointment of the commissioners in Mr. Fox's India bill, for the term only of one year more, though they were removable by address of parliament, had yet excited the greatest alarm and clamour, because they were not This removable by the crown. appeared the more extraordinary, as they were not concerned in matters that had any particular relation to the crown ; neither did the bill in queftion compel the commissioners to report their proceedings, or give any fecurity to the public that they would do their duty. Thus an immense expence might be incurred, without producing any effect whatever. This omifion he added was the more unpardonable, fince the hill appointing the commissioners of the public accounts compelled them to report their proceedings at the opening of every feffion.

But his itrongeft objection to the bill was, the unlimited power it gave to the commifficners to call for, and take into their cuflody, all titles, maps, plaus, and documents, which related to lands holden of the crown. This, he faid, was inftituting a court of inquisition unknown in any other, much lefs in this country; it left every man concerned without any thing like certainty of title or effate ; whereever a refervation was made for the delivery of copy deeds, it was invariably the cuftom to infert a clause that they fhould be made by perfons appointed by the holder of the deeds, but at the expence of the perfon claiming them.

Mr. Jelliffe concluded by moving amendments for the protection of title deeds, and to oblige the commissioners to report their proceed. ings to the house ; which were immediately received without a divifion, and the bill paffed the commons. It was afterwards attacked with a confiderable degree of feverity in the house of July 7th. lords by lord Loughborough, who, upon the third reading, oppofed it chiefly upon the following grounds :- First, Because the bill did not agree with his majefty's meffage, on which it profeffed to be founded : that meffage only authorized an enquiry to be made into the flate and condition of the woods, forefts, and land revenues belonging to the crown; but the bill proceeded to alienate and difpofe of the land revenues of the crown, contrary to the ulage of parliament, and inconfistent with the refpect due to the crown .----Secondly,

Secondly, Becaufe the bill repealed the acts of the 22d and 23d of Charles the Second, and created a new power for the fale of those lands, without any exception of the rents in the former acts referved in behalf of divers perfons, and for fundry good and wholefome purpofes in those acts mentioned .--Laftly, Becaufe the powers granted to the commiffioners were dangerous to the fubject, and derogatory to the honour of the crown. It fubjected all perfons holding of the crown, or holding estates adjoining to crown lands, to an inquisition into their ancient boundaries and title deeds, at the mere motion of the commissioners, without any other legal or ordinary process. Ιt tended to restrain the tenants of the crown from their accuftomed rights and privileges; and the crown itfelf was deprived by it of the management of its own effate, which it transferred to the commissioners. The bill was neverthelefs carried by a majority of ten, the house dividing; contents 14, proxies 14; non-contents 11, proxies 7.

A proteft against this bill, containing the objections already mentioned, and fome other additional ones, was afterwarde figned by his lordship the earl of Carlisse, the duke of Portland, the earl of Sandwich, and the bishop of Bristol.

An attempt was made this feflion by the Hon. Mr. Marfham to extend the difqualifications refpecting the power of voting at elections, contained in the bill generally known by the name of Mr. Crewe's bill, to perfons holding places in the navy and ordnance-office.— 'Thefe places he added were all of a civil nature, and had not the most diftant connection or interference with the officers of the army or navy.

Mr. Crewe's bill, in fetting afide the votes of all perfons holding places in the cuftoms, excife, poft, and ftamp - offices, had done the higheft fervice to the conflictution. The bill he propofed, Mr. Marfham faid, was fo fimilar in its principle and operation to Mr. Crewe's, that every argument which was or could be adduced in favour of that bill, was equally applicable to the one in queffion.

The minister opposed the bill, alledging that it flood upon very different grounds from the bill brought in by Mr. Crewe, for which he had himfelf voted. The reafon, he faid, for paffing that act, was the necessity of reducing the influence of the crown-an influence which the house had previoufly declared had increafed, was increasing, and ought to be dimi-If Mr. Crewe's bill had nithed. answered that purpose, then the object contended for was gained ; if it had not, it was unwife to extend fuch principles as that bill contained, where no benefit arole from their operation.

At the fame time Mr. Pitt allowed that Mr. Crewe's bill might be faid to have gone a good way in deftroving that influence which in matters of election ought effectually to be eradicated : but there were other grounds of objection which he had to the prefent bill, and which he felt to be infurmountable. The perfons difqualified by Mr. Crewe's bill were of fuch a defeription, that the very burthens imposed upon the public were conducive to their private interefts; and therefore they were peculiarly unfit to elect the members of that affembly, whole whofe bufinels it was to impofe those burthens. Again, the officers of the excife and cuftoms pervaded the whole kingdom; whereas the present description of men were confined only to particular parts of There existed another the coaft. difference between th m, which was to be taken into confideration : the revenue officers were completely under the influence of government, but the perfons employed in the departments in question were subject to no controul whatever ; they were at all times capable of procuring what was equal to their present salaries in foreign services, or with our merchantmen at home. If the prefent bill paffed, the whole corps of our naval artificers might carry their skill and industry to a foreign market, and there did not exift a maritime country that would not grant them their own terms. Laftly, he added, that it did not appear, that the influence of the persons in question was ever felt in those parts of the kingdom where, if at all, it must be the more prevalent.

Mr. Fox made fome observations on the minister's reasons for rejecting the proposed measure. He began with observing, that it was allowed that no degree of influence with respect to elections cught to remain in the crown; but if depriving the revenue-officers of the right of voting tended to reduce that influence, the depriving those other fervants of the crown must neceffarily reduce it fill more.

With respect to the diffinction made between the different perfons concerned, namely that one body extended over the whole kingdom, whilft the other was confined to a few places, it only proved, when taken in its fullest extent, that as the officers of the revenue were more numerous and more diffused than the fervants of the navy and ordnance, the disqualifying of the latter, although an uleful and neceffary regulation, was not fo in the fame degree, and to the fame extent, as the disqualification of the former. Next, it had been urged that the influence of the perfons in queftion had not been felt; but would it, Mr. Fox faid, be argued, that becaufe the influence might be either dormant or unfuccessful, that it therefore did not exift? It had also been suggested, he faid, that the naval artizans, if deprived of their votes, would hire themfelves to foreign powers; but fuch a fuppofition, he added, was too ridiculous to be treated ferioufly. They were to go abroad, he fuppofed, to have voices in the appointment of members of parliament in France, or were to influence the elections of Spain, or were to look for a fhare in the ariftocracy of Holland. He concluded by ferioufly calling the attention of the house to the confideration of the prefent influence of the crown, and to the confequent necessity of applying the remedy now propoled. After fome further debate Mr. Mariham's motion for the fecond reading of his bill was negatived by a majority of 76; the numbers being for the question 41, against it 117.

W E have before related, that on the first day of the feffion Mr. Burke was called upon by the agent of the late governor general of Bengal to produce the criminal charges against Mr. Haftings in such a shape as might enable parliament to enter into a full discussion of his conduct, and come to a final decision upon it.

On Friday the 17th of February, Mr. Burke brought this fubject before the houfe of commons: after defiring the clerk to read the 44th and 45th refolutions of cenfure and recal of Mr. Haftings, moved by Mr. Dundas on the 20th of May 1782, he faid that he entirely agreed in opinion with the friends of that gentleman, that the refolution which had been read thould not be fuffered to remain a mere calumny on the page of their journals; at the fame time he lamented that the folemn bufinels of the day fhould have devolved upon him by the natural death of fome, by the political death of others, and in fome inftances by a death to dery and to principle. It would doubtlefs, he faid, have come forward with much more weight and effect in the hands of the right honourable gentleman who had induced the house to adopt those resolutions, or in those of another gentleman, who had taken an active part in the felect committee, and then enjoyed a confidential post ia the Indian department, the fecretary of the board of controul; but as he could not perceive any intentions tions of the kind in either of those members, and as he had been perfonally called upon, in a manner highly honourable to the party interefted in the proceeding, but in a manner which rendered it impossible for him not to do his duty, he fliould endeavour to the best of his power to support the credit and dignity of the house, to enforce its intentions, and give vigour and effect to a fentence passed four years ago; and he trufted that he fhould receive that protection, that fair and honourable interpretation of his conduct, which the house owed to those who acted in its name, and under the fanction of its authority.

Having endeavoured upon this ground to remove the odium of appearing a forward profecutor of public delinquency, Mr. Burke called back the recollection of the house to the feveral proceedings which had been had in parliament refpecting the mal-administration of the company's affairs in India, from the period of Lord Clive's government down to the reports of the fecret and felect committees, the refolutions moved thereupon, and the approbation repeatedly given to thefe proceedings by his majefty from the throne.-It was upon the authority, the fanction, and the encouragement thus afforded him, that he rested his acculation of Mr. Haftings, as a delinquent of the first magnitude.

After going through an infinite variety of topics relative to this part of his fubject; he proceeded to explain the process which he should recommend to the house to purfue. There were, he obferved, three feveral modes of proceeding against state delinquents, which, according to the exigencies of particular cafes, had each at different times been adopted. The first was to direct his majesty's attorney general to profecute; from this mode he acknowledged himfelf totally averfe, not only becaufe he had not difcovered in the learned gentleman, whofe refpectable character and professional abilities had advanced him to that high official fituation, that zeal for public juftice in the prefent inftance, which was a neceffary qualification in a public profecutor ; but more efpecially, becaufe he thought a trial in the court of King's Bench, amidft a cloud of caufes of meum and tuum, of trefpafs, affault, battery, conversion, and trover, &c. &c. not at all fuited to the fize and enormity of the offender, or to the complicated nature and extent of his Another mode of prooffences. ceeding occafionally adopted by the house was by bill of pains and penalties; this mode he alfo greatly difapproved of, in the first place, as attended with great hardship and injuffice to the party profecuted, by obliging him to anticipate his defence; and fecondly, as putting the houfe in a fituation which, where the nature of the cafe did not abfolutely require it, ought carefully to be avoided, that of shifting its character backwards and forwards, and appearing in the fame caufe one day as accufers, and another as judges. -The only process that remained, was by the ancient and conftitutional mode of impeachment; and even in adopting this process he should advife the houfe to proceed with all poffible caution and prudence. It had been usual, he observed, in the first instance, to resolve that the party accufed fhould be impeached, and then to appoint a committee to examine examine the evidence, and find the articles on which the impeachment was to be founded .- This mode of proceeding had, from the heat and paffion with which the minds of men were fometimes apt to be inflamed, led the house, on more than one occasion, into the difgraceful dilemma of either abandoning the impeachment they had voted, or of preferring articles which they had not evidence to fupport.-In order to feer clear of this difgrace, he fhould move that fuch papers as were neceffary for fubftantiating the guilt of Mr. Haftings, if guilt there was, fhould be laid before the houfe; and that thefe papers, together with the charges extracted from them, fhould be referred to a committee of the whole houfe, and evidence examined thereon: if the charges fhould then appear, what he believed they would be found to be, charges of the blackeft and fouleft nature, and fupported by competent and fufficient evidence, the houfe would then proceed with confidence and dignity to the bar of the houfe of lords.

Having flated thefe matters with great precision, Mr. Burke went into a feries of reflections on the pature of the office he had undertaken. Every accufer, he faid, was himfelf under acculation at the very time he accused another; it behaved him to act upon fure grounds, and he had therefore chosen the line of conduct he had just explained, as being at the fame time the most effectual for the purposes of public juffice, and the leaft exposed to the danger of error : he urged the unavoidable necessity of making the enquiry perfonal; he afked what would be the fentiments of the miferable and oppressed natives of India, if the refult of the proceedings in that house should be to find that enormous peculation exifted, but that there was no peculator; that there was groß corruption, but no perfon to corrupt, or to be corrupted ; that a torrent of violence. oppression, and cruelty had deluged that country, but that every foul in it was juft, moderate, and humane 🖡 To trace peculation to the peculator, corruption to its fource, and opprefion to the oppreffor, had been the object of the refearches of the feveral committees that had been inflituted at different times by the houle; and the refult was, they found that government in India could not be foul and the governor pure. After a speech of confiderable length, in which these and many other topics of the fame nature were argued with great force and perspicuity, Mr. Burke concluded, by moving, " That copies of all correspondence, fince the month of January 1782, between Warren Haftings, Elquire, governor general of Bengal, and the court of directors, as well before as fince the return of the faid governor general, relative to prefents and other money particularly received by the faid governor general, be laid before this house."

The reflections thrown out by Mr. Burke, relative to the refolutions of the fecret committee, and the conduct of Mr. Dundas, called up that gentleman to juffirly the part he had taken.—He acknowledged that he undoubtedly was the perfon who fuggefied the refolutions alluded to, and he had not the fmalleft foruple to admit that the fine fentiments that he entertained respecting Mr. Haffings, at the time of proposing those refolutions, lutions, he entertained at that moment; but would any one contend that those fentiments went fo far as to fuppefe Mr. Haftings to be a fit object for a criminal profecution? The refolutions went to the recal of Mr. Haffings, a matter which he at the time thought expedient, and had recommended it to the house as a matter of expediency only. He thought the conduct of Mr. Haftings, fince the period to which those resolutions referred, not only not criminal but highly meritorious, and he had for that reafon approved of the vote of thanks which the court of directors had conferred upon him.

The charge of inconfiltency being again urged against Mr. Dundas with great feverity, by Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt rofe up in his defence, and retorted the charge with fome acrimony on Mr. Fox, whole conduct, he faid, in the coalition he had formed with a perfon whom he had been in the habit of loading with the most extravagant reproaches, had fufficiently explained to the public his ideas of confiftency. He contended that the refolution of recal by no means pledged the house to profecute; fince, if that were the cafe, they would on all occasions be reduced to the necessity either of hefitating on fuch a flep (however urgent the emergency might be) until a full examination of the conduct of the perfon could be had, or of rendering a profecution unavoidable, although no adequate enquiry had been infituted to evince its propriety. The refolutions coutained in themfelves the whole of the object for which they were defigned, namely, that in order to recover the loft confidence of the princes of India, it was adviseable, what ?--- to punifh ?--- No! but to recal certain of the company's fervants. Whether the conduct by which the confidence had been loft was imputable as a crime to those fervants, was totally another confideration : he was indeed ready to join in opinion with the gentlemen opposite to him, that if any real guilt was to be inveftigated, and adequate punifhment to be inflicted. his right honourable friend would be full as proper a perfon to take the lead, and full as likely to accomplish all the purposes of public justice, as those gentlemen into whofe hands the profecution would fall; but, as it had been faid in the courfe of the debate that there were occasions when the formal rules of common justice might be overleaped, and a profecution conducted with violence and refentment, rather than by the dull forms of ordinary proceedings, perhaps, confidering the prefent bufinels in that point of view, the gentlemen that had taken it up wore the fittest people to be intrusted with it : with refpect to the papers moved for, Mr. Pitt made no objection, but hoped the gentleman who moved for them would inform the houfe as early and as explicitly as possible of the nature and extent of the charges he intended to make.

The quefiion being carried, Mr. Burke proceeded to move for a great variety of other papers, which he alledged were neceffary for the profecution of the caufe he had undertaken. Thefe motions produced much converfation, and towards the clofe of the day there appeared fome hefitation in the miniflers of the crown, whether it would be proper to produce whatever papers might might be called for on the mere fuggeftion of the mover, without infifting upon his flating to the houfe the connection they had with the matters contained in the reports of the committees, beyond which they did not think he ought to go in the matter of his intended accufation. At this flage of the bufinefs the houfe adjourned at one o'clock, on account of the illnefs of the fpeaker; and the day following the conversation was renewed, upon a motion for papers relative to the affairs of Oude.

It was urged that it would be a precedent of a very dangerous nature to fuffer papers, of the contents of which the house was in a great measure ignorant, to be laid upon the table, merely on the word of any individual member. Why did not the honourable gentleman bring forward a specific accufation ? the houfe might then be enabled to judge whether the papers moved for were necessary to fustantiate the charge or not; but till that was done, it was their duty to refift the production of them. In opposition to this unexpected obstacle, Mr. Burke contended, and endeavoured to prove from feveral inflances, that the practice of the house by no means bound them down to the mode of proceeding to which it was attempted to fubject him. In every criminal process the accufer, who, by becoming fuch, took upon himfelf the onus probandi, was entitled to have fuch documents and papers as he effeemed neceffary to support the charge he undertook to bring forward, open and acceffible. A refusal must be attended with a double injustice. If the accufer wanted collateral and explanatory VOL. XXVIII.

aid, he ought not to be denied the means of digesting, explaining, or fimplifying those facts of which he was in prior possession. If, on the other hand, the grounds of accufation could be extenuated, if the feverity of the charge could be abated, nay, perhaps annihilated, a denial of that opportunity to the accufer was an injustice to the accused. He should therefore confider the rejection of his motion as a stratagem to get rid of the whole enquiry; but he entertained too ftrong a fenfe of what he owed to public juffice, and to humanity, to accept of the fubterfuge that was offered him, and fteal away from and defert their caufe. He knew that he fhould have to encounter a connected force of the first weight and influence in the country : but he had not undertaken the accufation upon light grounds, and he had the firmest reliance upon the justice of his caufe. He had been told, that the profecution would be unpopular; that the people of England would reject him in fuch a purfuit .- O miserable public ! he exclaimed ; what ! for having taken up the caufe of their injured and, oppressed fellow-subjects in India, for attempting to bring to juilice the plunderers of markind, the defolators of province;, the onpreffors of an innocent and meritorious people, in every rank, fex, and condition, the violators of public faith, the deftroyers of the Britifh character and reputation-was he to be unpopular? Those who had raifed monuments of their benevolence, by providing afylams and receptacles for human milery, were justly ranked for fuch deeds amongst the benefactors to mankind; but even there acts of pa-[I]triotiim triotifm and charity were not to be compared to the noble work of fupporting the most facred rights and valuable interests of mankind, by bringing to public justice the man who had facrificed them to his cruelty, his avarice, and his ambition.

After purfuing this train of reflections with great energy and eloquence, Mr. Burke remarked, that the prevaricatio accusatorum had been reckoned amongst one of the first fymptoms of the decline of the Roman greatness. But at the time this observation was made, when Verres was accused by Cicero, every means of information was allowed him. One hundred and fifty days were granted him, to collect the materials of his acculation from fo near All the puba province as Sicily. lic records were open to him, and perfons fent out of Italy to every place where the proofs of his guilt could be collected. In like manner, when the Cicero of the prefent age felt that indignity against public crimes which did him fo much honour, every possible affistance was afforded him ; every paper which he wanted was produced; every avenue of information was opened ; all parties concurred in encouraging him; the flower of the bar fupported him; crown lawyers were engaged in making refearches; and treafury clerks exerted themfelves with all the enthufiafm of public virtue. In fhort the learned gentleman obtained more information than he might have ultimately wished to have brought in charge against the delinquent he profecut-Mr. Burke added, that it was ed. fufficiently visible that his fituation was in every respect the very reverse; that, for his own part, he only called for what the hand of power had no excufe for refufing. The papers for which he had moved he avowed were neceffary for his purpole; and it was incumbent on those who refused them to juftify, by fome better plea than that of ignorance of their contents, the refusal of them.

Major Scott followed Mr. Burke, and agreed in opinion with him, that the papers were neceffary to be produced; and Mr. Pitt, after many professions of the most unbiaffed impartiality, concurred with them; remarking, at the fame time, that it would be but fair and candid in the right honourable mover, to give the houfe fome fpecific information of the fubject matter of his charges, and to flate the grounds and reasons for the production of fuch papers as he might think it necessary to call for in support of them. In compliance with this requeft, Mr. Burke read to the house a fhort abitract of the feveral charges which he defigned to bring forward; and pointed out the matters which the feveral papers, he afterwards moved for, were intended to explain and fubstantiate.

The reft of Mr. 3d March. Burke's motions met with little opposition, till, on the 3d of March, he moved for copies of letters, and other papers, relative to the treaty of peace with the Mahrattas. This motion was oppofed by Mr. Dundas and Mr. Pitt, on two grounds; first, that the treaty in queftion was a wife and falutary treaty, and had faved the British empire in Afia; and, fecondly, that the production of the papers moved for would discover tranfactions relative to that peace, which ought to be kept a fecret from the country powers in India, infomuch much as it would difclose the means by which the feveral states that were confederate against England were made jealous of each other, and the intrigues by which they were induced to diffolve that confederacy. In answer to these objections, it was urged, by Mr. Burke and Mr. Fox, in the first place, that to argue from the merits of the peace, was to beg the queflion. Mr. Haftings was charged with having acted in that treaty unjuftly, treacheroufly, and cruelly; that was the point in iffue, and it could only be tried by the produc-The accufer tion of the papers. alledged he was in pofferfion of the facts, and demanded the public documents only as furnishing the means of formal evidence of his charge. In the fecond place it was argued, that the reafons given for withholding the papers were, in fact, the ftrongeft reafons for producing them; those reasons amounted to this, that the papers ought not to be produced, becaufe they would difcover in what manner the different powers in India had been facrificed in that treaty to each other-the very point that was charged in the ac-This argument, if carcufation. ried to its full extent, would cover almost every species of political delinquency, fince it made it only neceffary for the delinquent to add complicated treachery to his other crimes, to render it dangerous to bring him to a public trial. But the argument was futile in another respect; the transactions alluded to were but too well known, and too generally condemned and reprobated throughout India. If they were to be a fecret, it would be a fecret only to the houfe of commons, and of this fufficient proof might eafily be given. After a long debate, the house divided upon the motion, which was rejected by a majority of 87 to 44.

The conduct of 17th March. administration in refusing the papers moved for by Mr. Burke, and the reasons upon which that refutal was grounded, appeared to the members in opposition of fo ferious and alarming a nature, that the fame motion was twice renewed, on the 6th and on the 17th of March by Mr. Fox, but reftricted to the correspondence of a Major Brown, an agent of Mr. Haftings at the court of Delhi. Copies of many parts of this correspondence were in the hands of fome private individuals in England, and they were used, in the course of the debate, both to prove the criminal conduct of Mr. Haftings, and the futility of the pretension of fecrefy.

It was flrongly urged, that if the grounds upon which ministers withheld those papers from the infpection of parliament were admitted by the house as sufficient, it would in fact vest them with a power of protecting every delinquent, and quashing at the very outfet every public enquiry. Notwithitanding the odium which was attempted by these repeated difcuffions to be thrown on adminiftration, they continued firm in their refutal; urging, in addition to their former arguments, that the agency of major Brown was by no means proved, and that the correfpondence in queftion appeared to contain merely the wild and chimerical projects of an unauthorized individual. The motion was rejected on the laft day by 140 to 73.

ANNUAL REGISTER, 1786. 122

On the fourth of April, April 4th. Mr. Barke, in his place, charged Warren Haltings, efq; the late governor general of Bengal, with fundry high crimes and mifdemeanors, and delivered at the table the nine first articles of his charge, and the reit in the courfe of the following week, amounting in all to 22 in number. On the 26th Mr. Haftings requested by petition to the house to be permitted to be heard in his defence to the feveral articles, and that he might be allowed a copy of the fame *. Mr. Burke declared his wifh that every reafonable degree of indulgence should be shewn to Mr. Haftings : he should therefore readily confent to his being heard in his defence, though he did not think it quite agreeable to the regularity of their proceeding, that he should be heard in the present stage of it. With respect to a copy of the charges, he believed there was no precedent of fuch an indulgence being granted. It was well known that it was his original intention to have gone through the whole of his evidence before he delivered in his articles, and to let the charge growout of the evidence; but the house, in its wildom, had thought proper to vote a different mode of proceeding, and to direct that the charges should be first made; and that he should then proceed to fubiliantiate them by evidence. Hence he had been under the necessity of new arranging his plan, and of making his charges as comprehenfive as poffible, taking in and flating every thing with which private information could furnish him. In their present form they were to be considered merely as a general collection of accufatory facts, intermixed with a variety of collateral matter, both of fact and reasoning necessary for their elucidation; and the committee to which they were to be referred would neceffarily find occallon to alter them materially. For this reason also he thought it would be highly improper to give a copy of them, in the prefent flage of the business, to Mr. Hastings. Thefe reafons, however, being overruled by the majority, and a copy ordered to be granted to Mr. Haftings, Mr. Burke moved, that the house should refolve itself into a committee to examine the witneffes that had been ordered to attend. This was also objected to by the other fide of the house, on this

The humble Petition of WARREN HASTINGS, late Governor General of Bengal.

Sheweth,

THAT your petitioner obferves by the vo'es of the 4th and 12th days of April inftant, that Mr. Burke in his place charged Warren Haftings, late governor general of Bengal, with fundry high crimes and mifdemeanors ; and prefented to the house several articles of charge of high crimes and mifdemeanors againit the faid Warten Haftings.

Your petitioner therefore humbly prays that he may be heard in his defence to the feveral articles ; and that he may be allowed a copy of the fame.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, fhall ever pray.

ground,

ground, that as they had agreed to hear the defence of Mr. Haftings, they ought to wait till that had been gone through, fince he might poffibly be able to offer fuch matter in exculpation of himfelf as would induce the houfe entirely to ftop all further proceeding. This argument was strongly supported by the maßer of the rolls and the attorney general, and ably oppofed by Mr Hardinge, folicitor general to the queen, and Mr. Anstruther.

The decision of the house, by a majority of 140 to 80 against the proposition of Mr. Burke, was confidered as a most favourable prognoffic by the friends of Mr. Haftings; and they fpoke with the utmost confidence of a speedy conclusion of the whole business in his favour.

On the 1ft of May, May Ift. Mr. Haftings being called to the bar, addressed the house in a fhort speech; in which he stated, that he confidered his being allowed to be heard in that stage of the business as a very great indulgence, for which he begged leave to make his most grateful acknowledgments to the house; and as his wifh was to deliver what he had to fay in answer to the charges that had been prefented against him by an honourable member, with a greater fhare of accuracy and correctness than he could pretend to in a fpeech from memory, he had committed his fentiments to writing, and hoped to be permitted to read them. This request being granted, Mr. Haftings proceeded to read his defence, in which he was affifted by Mr. Markham, a fon of the archbishop of York, and the clerks of the houfe. Three days were spent in going through the feveral parts of his defence; and it was afterwards, at the requeit of Mr. Haftings, ordered to be laid upon the table of the house, and printed for the use of the members.

As two articles only of the charge were decided upon in this feffion of parliament, we shall, for the fake of giving our readers a connected view of the whole fubject together. defer entering at prefent into the fubject matter of the charges exhibited, the proofs by which they were fupported, or the allegations urged by Mr. Haftings in his defence, and content ourfelves with a narrative of the proceedings of the house of commons.

In our next volume we shall endeavour to give as concife and comprehenfive an abilitract of the whole business, as its immense extent and complicated variety will admit. We shall therefore only observe. with respect to the defence of Mr. Haftings, that it does not appear to have produced an effect answerable to the fanguine expectation of his friends, or to the views of those who might with to have taken a plaufible opportunity of quathing the whole proceeding, by a fhort queflion upon the general merits of the perfon accufed.

In the mean time, the houfe, in a committee, proceeded in the examination of witneffes in proof of June 1st. the charges; and on the first of June Mr. Burke brought forward the Rohilla charge, and moved the following refolution thereupon :- " That the committee, heaving confidered the faid article, and examined evidence on the fame. are of opinion that there are grounds fufficient to charge Warran Haf- $\begin{bmatrix} I \end{bmatrix}_{3}$

tings with high crimes and mifdemeanors upon the matter of the faid article."

Mr. Burke introduced his motion with a folemn invocation of the juftice of the houfe, which he faid was particularly due, as well to the people of Great Britain, becaufe the national credit and character were deeply involved, and implicated in the iffue of the bufiness about to be brought before them, as for the fake of their own honour and dignity. He defcribed with great force the nature of the question to be decided; de. claring emphatically, that it was an appeal from British power to British juffice .- The charge, he faid, muft either condemn the accufer or the accufed : there was no medium. The refult muit be, that Warren Haftings, efq; had been guilty of grofs, enormous, and flagitious crimes; or, that he was a bafe, calumniatory, wicked, and malicious accufer. He enlarged upon the degree of guilt afcribable to that man who should dare prefume to take up the time of the houfe by rafhly coming forward, and urging groundlefs and ill-founded charges against a perfon who had been intrufted with high and exalted offices in the government of a part of our territories, much larger and more extensive than the whole island of Great Britain. There were, he observed, but three fources of falle acculation, viz. ignorance, inadvertency, or paffion; by none of thefe three had he been actuated: ignorance he could not plead, becaufe he knew the fubject as fully as the labour and ftudy of fix years could make him know it : inadvertency as little could he be charged with, becaufe he had deliberately proceeded, and examined every step he took in the business with the most minute and cautious attention: and, leaft of all, could it be faid, with any colour of truth, that he had been actuated by paffion. Anger indeed he had felt, but furely not a blameable anger; for who ever heard of an enquiring anger, a digefting anger, a collating anger, an examining anger, or a felecting anger? The anger he had felt was, an uniform, steady, public anger, but never a private anger; that anger which five years ago warmed his breast, he felt precisely the fame and unimpaired at that moment. Not all the various occurrences of the last five years, neither five changes of administration, nor the retirement of the fummer, nor the occupation of winter, neither his public nor his private avocations, nor the fnow, which in that period had fo plentifully fhowered on his head, had been able to cool that anger, which he acknowledged to feel as a public man, but which, as a private individual, he had never felt for one moment.

He observed, that the vote they were to give that day was not merely on the cafe of Mr. Haftings; they were to vote a fet of maxims and principles, to be the guide of all future governors in India. The code of political principles which they fhould that day establish as the principles of British government in its diffant provinces, would fland recorded as a proof of their wifdom and juffice, or of their disposition to tyranny and oppreffion. He entered at large into those peculiar circumftances in the connection between this country and India, which rendered the retribution of justice, in cafes of cruelty and oppreffion, extremely difficult, and contrasted them with the fituation of the provinces

vinces conquered by the Romans. The Roman empire was an empire of continuity, each province being either immediately or nearly accelfible by land; they had likewife one general tongue to fpeak with, fo that each man was able to tell his They had tale in his own way. another advantage, which arole from the very circumstance of their being conquered, and it was that the principal perfons who accomplished the conquest always acquired a property and influence in each new province by them fubdued, and of courfe the vanquished found patrons and protectors in the perfons of their conquerors. Each province was also confidered as a body corporate, and confequently each province was enabled to fend their grievance to Rome collectively, and to state them as speaking with one mouth. He next adverted to the fituation of an accufer in Rome, and to the advantages that attended him in profecuting his charges against a state delinquent, who was stripped of his power, and even of his rights as a citizen, pending the profecution, the better to enable his accufer to make out and ettablish his accusation. He drew a diffinction between this facility of coming at a Roman governor, charged with high crimes and misdemeanors, and the extreme difficulty of fubstantiating an accufation against a British governor. When it was confidered that Mr. Haftings had been for fourteen years at the head of the government in India, and that no one complaint during that time had been tranfmitted to England against him, the house must be convinced of the enormous degree of power he had to contend with, to which alone could he afcribed the filence in question, fince it was not in human nature, fituated as Mr. Haftings had been, to preferve fo pure, even-handed, and unimpeachable a conduct, as to afford no room for a fingle accufation to be flated againft him.

After this exordium, Mr. Burke flated at large the fubject matter of the charge, and concluded a long and eloquent speech, with defiring the clerk to read the refolution of May 1782, to clear himfelf from the imputation of having rathly and fingly meddled with the fubject; and to shew that the house had, in very strong terms, already reprobated Mr. Haftings's conduct in the Rohilla war. The motion was fupported by Mr. Wilbraham, Mr. Powis, Mr. Montague, Lord North, Mr. M. A. Taylor, Mr. Wyndham, and Mr. Hardinge; and oppofed by Mr. Nicholls, Lord Mornington, Mr. H. Browne, and Lord Mulgrave. At half paft three o'clock the debate was adjourned, and renewed the day following by Mr. Francis, Mr. Anstruther, and Mr. Fox, on the one fide; and Mr. W. Grenville, Mr. J. Scott, Mr. Burton, Mr. Wilberforce, and Mr. Dundas, on the other. At half pail feven the committee divided, when there appeared for the motion 67, against it 119.

On the 13th of June, 13th June. Mr. Fox brought forward the charge respecting the Rajah of Benares. Nearly the fame perfons took a part in this debate as in the former, and it was carried by a majority of 119 to 79, " that there was matter of impeachment against Warren Hastings contained in the faid charge." The chancellor of the exchequer concurred in this vote, but upon very narrow ground. He thought that the de-[I] 4mands mands made upon the Raja went bevond the exigence of the cafe, and that Mr. Hailings had pushed the exercife of the arbitrary diferetion entrusted to him beyond the necef-The conduct of fity of the fervice. the minister on this occasion drew upon him much indecent calumny from the friends of Mr. Haftings; they did not hefitate to accuse him out of doors, both publicly and privately, of treachery. They declared it was in the full confidence of his protection and fupport, that they had urged on Mr. Burke to bring forward his charges; and that the gentleman accufed had been perfuaded to come to their bar, with an hafty and premature defence : and they did not fcruple to attribute this conduct in the minister to motives of the bafeft jealoufy.

During the course of the proceedings of the house of commons on the impeachment of Mr. Haftings, another subject, relative to the administration of the company's affairs in India, underwent a warm difcuffion in both houfes of parliament; this was a bill brought in by Mr. Dundas, for amending Mr. Pitt's act, paffed in the year 1784, for regulating the government of the East India company. Previous to the first mention of the subject by Mr. Dundas, Mr. Francishad moved for leave to bring in a bill with the fame title, but much more extensive in its objects. Upon this motion the previous quefiion was put, and carried without a division. The principal object of Mr. Dundas's bill was to enlarge the powers of the governor general; firft, by vefting in him the nomination to the vacant feats in the council : fecondly, by uniting the offices of governor general and commander in chief of the forces : and thirdly, by authorizing him to decide upon every meafure, whether his council agreed with him or not. Leave being given to bring in the bill, Mr. Francis moved, " that it be an instruction to the gentlemen appointed to prepare and bring in a bill to explain and amend an act, paffed in the 24th year of his majesty's reign, intituled, ' An act, &c.' that in preparing the fame they do never lose fight of the effect, which any meafure to be adopted for the good government of our poffeffions in India may have on our own conflitution, and our dearest interefts at home; and particularly, that in amending the faid act they do take care that no part thereof shall be confirmed or re-enacted, by which the unalienable birthright of every British subject to a trial by jury, as declared in magna charta, thall be taken away or impaired." This motion was rejected without debate, by a majority of 85 to 16.

On the zzd of March the bill was committed, when the claufes conferring fo extraordinary a degree of power on the governor general were opposed with a torrent of eloquence by Mr. Burke. He protested in the strongest terms against the principle of a bill which was, he faid, to introduce an arbitrary and defpotic government in India, on the falfe pretence of its tending greatly to the firength and fecurity of the British possessions there, and giving energy, vigour, and dispatch to the measures and proceedings of the executive government. He reprobated the whole of this idea, contending that an arbitrary and defpotic government was always fure to produce the reverfe of energy, vigour, and difpatch; its its conftant features being weaknefs, debility, and delay. He referred to the Turkifh government, and every arbitrary government that ever existed, in proof of his affertion.

In answer to these objections, Mr. Dundas contended, that before gentlemen took upon them to charge the empowering the governor general to act, in cafes of emergency, without the concurrence of the council, as the introduction of arbitrary government, it behoved them to prove that arbitrary government depended more upon one perfon governing than two, a polition which he believed it would not be easy to make out. He had ever confidered the governing by known laws, the prefervation of all the rights and franchifes of subjects, and trial in all cases of property by the established judicature of the country, as the invariable and undoubted proofs of freedom. This was the real cafe of India; the perfon intrusted with the administration of the country was indeed invested with more power, but he had therefore the greater responsibility : though in cafes of great emergency he was allowed to act without the concurrence of his council, yet he had still his council to advife with, and they were always about him, as checks and controuls upon his conduct; in fact, the governor could do no more under the prefent claufe than he could have done with the concurrence of his council before : in proportion as he had more perfonal power, fo had the bill provided more refponfibility.

All the mifchiefs and all the miffortunes which had for years taken place in India, he was fatisfied, in his own mind, after long and attentive inquiry into the affairs of that country, arofe intirely from the party principles of the members of the different councils in existence there, and the factious fcenes which those councils had almost uniformly prefented.

In the house of lords the bill was opposed on the fame grounds, with great ability, by Lord Carlifle, Lord Stormont, and especially by Lord Loughborough. In both houses it was supported by large majorities, and finally passed into a law.

On Tuefday the 11th of July, his majefty came down to the house of lords, and clofed the fefiion with a fpeech from the throne. He exprefied the particular fatisfaction he had received from their attention to the public bufinefs, and from the meatures which had been adopted for improving the refources of the country.

He thanked the house of commons for the fupplies which they had granted for the current year, and for the provision which they had made for difcharging the incumbrances on the civil lift: from the plan adopted for the reduction of the national debt, he looked for the most falutary effects; it was an object which he confidered as infeparably connected with the interests of the public. He faid, that the affurances he had from abroad promifed the continuance of general tranquillity: and he concluded by obferving, that the happy effects of peace had already appeared in the extension of the national commerce, and that no measures should be wanting on his part, which could tend to confirm those advantages, and to give additional encouragement ment to the manufactures and infignified, that the parliament flould duftry of his people.

His majelty's pleafure was then be prorogued until the 14th of September.

THE fame stile of outward magnificence, with the fame munificent spirit in the disposal of bounties or rewards, which have fo eminently diffinguished the court of Petersburgh through the present reign, still continue to be its peculiar characteristics. Every thing that comes within these descriptions is done in the highest file of grandeur, and feems not only fuited to the prefent greatness, but to the rifing hope and fortune of that empire. Indeed the empress proceeds upon fo large a fcale in thefe matters, that it feems rather to be graduated by an Afiatic than an European model. It is not often feen, at leaft in the western world, that a great military power, whole ambition and armaments fpread apprehenfion or terror all round, and which feems almost constantly looking for war, fhould at the fame time exceed all others in the fplendid establishments of peace and luxury.

The views of the court are, however, directed in its expences to other objects of greater importance and utility than those of mere magnificence. Of these may be confidered the great expedition undertaken in the year 1785, under the empress' direction, for the purpose of discovering, exploring, and examining the most remote provinces, and the yet unknown parts of that immenfe empire. The difficulties and perils to which this expedition by land was fuppofed liable, through the trackless deferts which they were to explore, the inhofpitality of the climates, and the barbarity of the nations they were to encounter, with the numberless obstacles of various forts they were to furmount, rendered the profpect much more terrible than it had appeared to our circumnavigators in any of their late great voyages of difcovery. The boldeft and most enterprizing perfons of all nations were accordingly fought out for this undertaking, and high rewards and promifes held out as an encouragement to their zeal and perfeverance. The Baron de Walchen Stedz, who has a regiment of cavalry in the empress's service, was appointed commander in chief upon this expedition. His corps confifted of 810 chofen men, who were led on by 107 officers of different degrees of diftinction, and accompanied by pioneers, artillery-men, handycraftfmen, draughtfmen, engineers, and an hiftoriographer. We fuppofe naturalists and aftronomers were included in fome of these descriptions. It need fcarcely be obferved, that they were amply provided with all manner of necessaries, and that they were furnished with credentials fuited fuited to every circumflance and fituation. It was supplied that the expedition could not be completed under three years.

The only fruit of their discoveries which has yet reached our knowledge, was that of a finall fugitive colonv of strangers and Christians, who they found thut up from the world, in a most sequestered part of the wilds of Caucafus; and who, in the language of the country, are called Ticheches. These poor people are faid to lead lives of the most exemplary piety, and to exhibit a primæval fimplicity of manners .---They are totally ignorant of their origin, any farther than knowing that they are ftrangers, which they are likewife confidered by the fcattered peighbouring nations. From an affinity in their language, and fome other circumstances, they are fupposed to be descended from a colony of Bohemians, who flying from the religious perfecutions in their own country, towards the clofe of the fifteenth century, found at length a refege from oppression, in the diffance from the reft of mankind which these remote defarts afforded.

Not fatisfied with the difcoveries which this expedition by land might produce, the empress formed another by fea about the fame time, in order to extend and afcertain those which, within the prefent century, have been unfuccefsfully attempted or imperfectly made by different Lieut. Col. Ruffian navigators. Bleumer was appointed to conduct this expedition, and commissioned to take along with him (befides able navigators) a number of perfons skilled in various arts, to affist in making proper enquiries, and in turning to the greatest advantage fuch discoveries as they might make, or were already made. They were to embark at the mouth of the river Anadir, and to profecute with greater accuracy and stricter obfervation those discoveries which had been made by former navigators, of feveral inhabited iflands lying about the 64th degree of latitude, in fituations advantageous for trade. They were then to double the Cape of Tfchurfky, the fuppoled ne plus ultra of the Ruffian navigators, (although they affirm the contrary) and entering the Straits which feparate Siberia from America, to purfue their voyage at leaft to the 74th degree of latitude; but if they find the feas practicable, to proceed as much farther as circumftances will permit.

It is a fingular circumflance, at leaft in the modern hiftory of the Old World, for a prince to be under the neceffity of undertaking great expeditions by f2a and land, in order to diffeover new countries within his own dominions. Such is the valleness of that unbounded empire!

But the great work, which, if completed, is to prove a lafting monument to the glory of Catherine, is the navigable canal in the province of Twer, which, by opening a communication between the river Twertz and the Milta, the former of which falls directly into the Wolga, and the latter, by the great lakes, opens the passage to the Neva, will not only effablish an inland navigation through all the vaft countries that lie between the flores of the Calpian and the Baltic, but will actually unite thefe diftant seas-an union unexampled in the history of mankind. This great work was fo far advanced in the fummer of 1785, as to occasion a vifit a visit from the empress in person, attended by a considerable part of the court.

Towards the close of the fame year, a treaty of commerce was concluded with the emperor, which afforded great advantages to his subjects, who, befides their being in general placed upon a footing with the most favoured nations, were granted feveral peculiar privileges. Among thefe was the claufe which granted them an exemption from all duties in the port of Riga, and which placed them in all respects upon the footing of native inhabitants in that city. In general, however, the advantages were reciprocal; fuch as in lowering the duties upon Hungarian wines on one fide, and those upon leather, hides, and other commodities, which might in a good meafure be confidered as staple, upon the other. Upon the whole, the treaty feemed evidently calculated to establish the easiest possible intercourfe, with the most intimate and lafting connections, between the fubjects of both empires; fo that though the terms of the treaty limited its duration to twelve years, it appeared that the mutual friendfhip which it was to produce among the people was intended to be hereditary. Upon this principle, feveral cities and trading towns in both empires were placed upon the footing of open markets, where the foreign inhabitant, or even temporary refident, on either fide, was to enjoy a fort of denizenship, and to poffefs the fame fecurity and advantages in trade with the native. The contracting parties likewife particularly bound themfelves to a strict adherence to the terms and principles of that regulation or compact of which the empress had been infitutress in the late war, and which has been so well known under the denomination of the Armed Neutrality; and which, though now of fome flanding, the ftill feems to regard with all the predilection which novelty gives to a tayourite tcheme.

A treaty of commerce with France was likewife at this time in negociation, and has fince been concluded. Similar negociations were at the fame time in train with feveral other nations. Yet, with this prevalent disposition to the forming of new connections in trade, the old treaty of commerce with England (which had fo long been confidered as the most favoured nation, and entitled to peculiar privileges in Ruffia) was now fuffered to expire, nor has it yet been renewed. The English had many grounds, without reckoning political caufes or motives, whereon to support their claims to peculiar favour and privileges in Ruffia. Among others, it is not to be forgotten, that the English were not only the first people who ever opened a commerce with Ruffia by fea, but that they were the nift who discovered her at all policifing an accessible fea coast. To them, therefore, Archangel owed her rife from a poor fiihing village to be the great emporium of northern trade; to that caufe were the adjoining defart provinces indebted for the degrees of culture, improvement, and civilization, which they received; and the whole empire, for thereby obtaining a ready vent for their own goods, and an eafy fupply of the numberless European commodities which they wanted.

But the emprefs feems to be faft departing from that line of policy which

which had been fo long generally purfued by her predeceffors as well as herfelf, in their conduct with refpect to England and France. The friendship shewn, and the effectual fervice done by England, in that war against the Ottomans which covered her reign with glory, and from which Ruffia has derived fuch vast acquisitions of territory, and so great an extension of at least apparent power, was but ill returned by the latter in her fublequent conduct, at the time that Great Britain was oppreffed and nearly overborne by the greatest combination of hoftile power which has been formed against any fingle state in modern times. The fcheme of the armed neutrality was formed upon principles as unfriendly to England, and, intentionally, if not actually, as inimical to her interest, as any thing fhort of abfolute hoftility could well be; nor did it afford much lefs encouragement to her numerous enemies, nor depres fion to herfelf (for friends the had none) than an actual declaration of war from Ruffia would have done.

Indeed the wifdom of the policy adopted by Great Britain in that Ruffan and Ottoman war was much queftioned, and her conduct no lefs cenfured, at the time, by not a few, who were well acquainted with the general politics of Europe, as well as with the interests of its respec-tive states. They contended, that fhe departed from the ancient principles, as well as the ftrait line of her policy, in encouraging or admitting Ruffia to take any hoftile share in maritime affairs, without the limits affigned to her by nature in the Baltic; but that to lead her by the hand, as it were, from the bottom of the gulph of Finland to the extremities of the Mediterranean, and there to aid or encourage her in acquiring poffessions which might enable her to establish a formidable naval force in those central feas, which would afford her an opportunity of continual interference in the concerns of all the states of Europe, was represented as fuch a violation of all the obvious principles of policy, that it feemed to partake more of the rash predilection of an individual, than of those cold but comprehensive maxims which should regulate the conduct of states, and which should look as fully to future contingencies as to prefent effect.

The coincidence of views and defigns between Ruffia and the house of Austria has drawn the bands of their union fo clofe, that whatevever excites jealoufy or diffatisfaction in the one is fure to operate no lefs powerfully upon the other; a circumstance by no means tending to render the fudden and extraordinary friendship which has fprung up between them the more pleafing to other flates. This was fully exemplified in the hafty and uncalled-for sentence, without being authorized as a judge or mediator to interfere, which Ruffia pronounced against Holland on the affair of the Schelde. The part taken by the king of Great Britain, as elector of Hanover, in his acceffion to the Germanic league, was, without question, the cause of distaste with both thefe formidable powers towards England : it was reported, and probably not without foundation, that the court of Petersburgh was no lefs zealous or urgent than that of Vienna, first in its endeavours to prevent the acceffion to that league, and then in using every poffible poffible means which could induce the king to a renunciation of it. The failure in both produced fuch effects as were to be expected from the character and respective fituation of the parties.

It is not, however, to be forgotten, that the commerce with England is to the full as effential to Russia as to the former; that a very confiderable annual balance, in money, is gained by her from England on that trade; that no merchants, with fmaller capitals or lefs commercial fpirit than the Englifh, could or would adventure the large fums of money which they constantly and necessarily advance long before the period of a return, in order to invigorate the manufactures, to fet the people to work in a wide and poor country, and to enable the fmall traders to bring the goods, whether staple or manufacture, from their respective and remote districts to market; and that without this effential pecuniary affistance, a consequent decrease of industry and product must inevitably take place, trade and manufacture would languish, and whatever there was would become a monopoly in the hands of a few opulent natives, whofe avarice would encumber it with fuch obstructions as would bring it to nothing. The advantages being thus reciprocal, the evil of any interruption to the long-eftablished commerce between the two countries (if fuch it really would be to England, which is a queftion of much doubt) is likely to cure itfelf; and things, if not carried too far, will probably, in defiance of caprice or ill-humour, as in other cafes of improper restrictions on trade, return to their natural channel. Commerce once loft is with great difficulty recovered; and it happens well to mankind in general, that there are but few products confined entirely to any one country. Our countrymen and old fellow-fubjects the Americans would joyfully fupply the place of Ruffia in many refpects; and those articles in which they are yet deficient might be procured in the intermediate time.

An irregular, expensive, and destructive, though not brilliant war, has been carried on with increafing action and effect between the Ruffians and the Tartar nations inhabiting the regions of Caucafus and the Cafpian, ever fince the violent feizure by the former of the Crimea, and the neighbouring countries. The circumftances of these remote transactions can at present be but very imperfectly known, and would not be very interefting if they were, any farther than as they tend to difplay the generous and defperate efforts which a people naturally brave and warlike will make, under the greatest possible difadvantages, in the contention for their rights and liberties. The condition of the contending parties was, indeed, very unequal: the one poffeffed numbers and courage, with fuch advantages as the ineffectivenefs of their means could enable them to derive from difficult countries, covered with vaft mountains, and abounding with inacceffible posts and dangerous defiles; but they wanted generals, military skill, experienced officers, and, befides artillery, all other effective weapons and machines for offence or defence; the fword and the arrow, once fo decifive in the field, being now of fmall avail in war. They being likewife composed of a number ber of fmall independent nations, no one leader was furnished with fuch coercive powers as could give due efficacy to the union. Neither is the manner of life, or habits of the Tartars, fuited to the fupport of a continual war; nor would their poverty and deficiency of refources admit the possibility of their keeping the field for any confiderable length of time, had their dispositions been otherwise.

On the other hand, their potent enemy, besides unlimited power and refource, and numbers at all times fuited to the exigency, were themfelves masters in the art of war, and adepts in all its great modern im-They poffeffed able provements. generals, experienced officers of all nations, and a line composed of veteran troops, inured to war, and trained up in the fevereft discipline; they were covered with a tremendous artillery, abundantly furnished with every weapon and engine invented either for defence or de-Arustion, supported by stores, magazines, and money, and could with little difficulty fortify in a fhort time whatever posts they thought proper, in fuch a manner as to render them impregnable to the enemy. The Ruthans were likewife joined by feveral bodies of dependant Tartars, and of Coffacks poffeffing fimilar qualities, who encountered the enemy in their own manner, being equaliy expert in the fuddennefs and quicknefs of their attacks and evolutions; equal in the endurance of sunger, cold, and fatigue; and equally adapted to the nature and difficulties of country and climate; but with the prodigious advantage of being led or under the direction of experienced officers, and of being infinitely better provided with arms and necessaries than their enemy.

But what greater and more decifive fuperiority need be mentioned, than that which the Russians derived from their acting in concert under a sole command; from their being enabled at all times to keep collected in strong bodies ready for action; and from their possessing an advantage which the Roman legions wanted, that their artillery rendered every camp an impregnable fortreis to the enemy? Under these circumstances they could lie quiet and fecure while the enemy was exhaufting his vigour in fruitlefsly travering the defarts, and wait coolly for that occasion of advantage which could not but foon offer : while the Tartars, destitute of flores and magazines, and having no other provision than the small bag of miller which each man carried, or oue of the horfes which he rode when that failed, however eminent their fucceffes might be, or however inviting the occasions for keeping the field, were obliged of necessity, at a given time, to feparate and retire to their respective hordes for subfistence. Then came on the inevitable feafon of danger and ruin; for, living in tents, or in villages not lefs open and defencelefs, they were cither furprized and cut to pieces by their active and mercilefs enemy, or if they had the fortune, by notice or accident, to efcape the fword, the lofs of their flocks and herds was fearcely lefs destructive in its consequences.

In fuch a flate of inequality the object of furprize is, how a war could at all exift; or at moft, how its exiftence could be much more than ephemeral. Yet under these difadvantages, which ieemed capable ble of annihilating all the principles of courage, excepting merely the confcioufnefs of its own dignity, the Tartars appear to have long fuppo.ted it with unexampled conftancy and refolution; and notwithftapding the dearth of intelligence that has prevailed upon the fubject, enough has transpired to shew that the Russian have found it full of difficulty and trouble; that their victories have by no means been decifive; and that however destructive they proved to the enemy, they have not been bloodlefs to themfelves.

Some circumstances of notoriety were neceffary to the communication of fuch intelligence as the public have received relative to thefe The fall of a brave transactions. German prince, of the house of Heffe Rhinfels, in the autumn of 1784, gave occasion to the mention of an action, which probably would not otherwife have been heard of. Its nature was, however, very differently represented. While a victory nearly bloodlefs, excepting in the misfortune that befel the prince, was claimed on one fide, the accounts from Conftantinople and Paris described that event as the confequence of hard and defperate fighting. The fame variation prevailed in general in the accounts which were received through the medium of either of those places, and those which were either published at or received from Petersburgh: from which it may be no very unfair conclusion, that exact information was not the principal object in any of their statements.

4 victory claimed by 1785. Ruffia in the following year was pretty well authenticated Vol. XXVIII. by the capture of a Tartar chan, two of his fons, and a nephew, who were all brought prifoners to Peterfburgh. This action was, however, acknowledged, even from thence, to have been very fevere; and it was owned, that in the beginning the fhock fell fo heavily upon the regiment of Attracan, that it was defeated, ruined, and its colonel killed.

In the latter part of the fame year, great havock was made and execution done among the Cuban Tartars, by the Ruffians. It would feem that the whole nation had been either fubdued, cut off, or totally ruined, by the deftruction of their villages, and the lofs of their flocks and herds at the approach of win-Brigadier General Apraxin, ter. and a Colonel Nagel, diftinguished themselves greatly about this time, either against the Cuban, or some other nations of Tartars; for we cannot pretend to afcertain dates, places, or circumstances. It appears, however, that colonel Nagel had the honour of being the first who defeated the new prophet, Sheich Manfour, and his adherents; who being disappointed in the fuccour which he had taught them to expect from Heaven, were doomed to a fore conviction, that their fanaticilm was no proof whatever against The prothe Russian bayonets. phet fought boldly on foot, at the head of feven or eight thousand of his followers, who were in the fame fituation (which evidently fhews that they were not Tartars); and his own reliance on the divine aid appears to have been fo weak, that as a substitute he employed his invention in the construction of some fort of rolling machines, which in their approach to the enemy they puffed on [K] on before them, as a cover from their fire. But the Ruffian foot ruthing on furioufly with their bayonets, and the cavalry falling in pell-mell upon the wings and rear, this rabble was foon routed, and purfued with unremitting flaughter. The impoftor was wounded, but had the fortune to efcape.

The empress had pub-1786. licly announced, in the beginning of the year of which we are to treat, her intention of making a magnificent progrefs to Cherson and the Crimea, in order to her being crowned fovereign of the new This defign feems at conquelts. frit to have been conceived in the most splendid ideas of eastern magnificence and grandeur. It was given out that Catharine was to be crowned empress of Taurida, and to be declared protectress or autocratrix of all the nations of Tartars. That, in order to render the folemnization of this great act the more august, aweful, and more extenüvely firiking, the was to be attended by the patriarch, by fix archbifhops, and by a great body of other ciergy; which, with the court and its attendants, must have formed a prodigious number. Triumphal arches were to be erected, and enriched with fculpture, devices and inferiptions, on the approaches to Cherfon, and in the town; the emprefs was to be drawn on the latter part of the way in a triumphal car, crowned with laurel; and the concourse of people was expected to be fo great, that the multitudes which attend the pilgrimages to Mecca would no longer be regarded as a wonder. She was besides to be efcorted by a formidable army, to be composed of no lefs than fix regiments of cavalry, and 22 of infantry. The magnificence of the procession, whether by land or by water, was to be fuited to that of the grand concluding ceremonial, A fleet of gallies were built on the Nieper, and befides their ornaments and embellishments, were to be furnifhed with all the accommodations neceffary for a court, or ufually found in a great city. It feemed as if coft was a matter not to be thought of in these preparations; and it feems fcarcely credible, though pofitively afferted, that the prodigious fum of feven millions of roubles, (amounting to about a million and a half sterling) had been originally dedicated to the purpose only of those prefents which were to be diftributed at the coronation. It may poffibly be thought, that the return of Alexander from India, and the voyage on the Cydnus, were not entirely out of mind in the conception of this defign.

We are probably to make the fame allowance for vanity and exaggeration in fome of thefe accounts, which is ufually neceffary in fimilar cafes; but it is, however, certain, that every thing that could be conceived fplendid or grand, was included in the original defign, and the ufual magnificence of the emprefs feems to give a fanction to the whole. It is likewife to be remembered, that there was a great political object in view in this splendour and expence. That it was undoubtedly expected that all the adjoining nations would have been either terrified by the power, or fascinated by the pomp, splendour, and wealth, which were now to be displayed, and that the Tartar chiefs, under these impressions, would not only have rendered the fcene truly glorious, by coming from all all parts to do homage to the new emprefs of the caft, but that fhe would thereby have enlarged and fecured her dominion without the trouble of war and conquest.

But these iron-minded Tartars do not appear ever to have had any true tafte for magnificence; excepting, indeed, when they have occafionally conquered half the world, and that too much wealth, and too long eafe, have led them by degrees to depart from their ancient inflitutions, and to adopt the follies and vices of the conquered. In the prefent instance, as foon as the intended grand progrefs, and its greaf object, were known, inflead of producing the expected effect, in dazzling or terrifying the Tartars, it ferved on the contrary, as a fignal of general and immediate danger, to cement their union in the ftrongeft manner, and to urge them to the greatest possible exertion, and to the most determined resistance. This foon became apparent; and the war daily became more ferious. The different confederacies of Tartars were faid, in a little time, to amount to a hundred thousand men; they were faid to have fhewn an unufual degree of judgment and skill in feizing the gorges of the mountains, and poffeiling themfelves of the ftrong pofts and leading paffes in fuch a manner, that while they were in a great measure fecure themselves from attack, they interrupted in a very dangerous degree the Ruffian communications, not only between different parts of the conquered countries, but between their armies and home. We are to observe, that as the particular fcenes of thefe transactions are never specified in the loofe accounts given of them,

It however appears, that the defultory inroads of the Tartars had caufed much trouble in the new countries, and kept the Ruffian troops on the frontiers in conflant employment through the fummer.---Whether the meafure adopted by the former of cutting off the communications led to the fucceeding event, or from whatever other caufe it might have proceeded, we are totally uninformed, but in the fucceeding autumn the most confiderable action of the war took place between the Ruffians and Tartars : the accounts of it from Peterlburgh were very fhort ; fome mentioning that their troops had received a check, and others acknowledging a defeat on the fide of Caucafus; but it was a bare as well as unwilling acknowledgment; not a fingle particular of the action, nor any fpecification of the number engaged, or lofs fuftained on either fide, being given. It was, however, repeated in fubfequent accounts; and what fhewed the affair to be of no finall confideration, was, that this lofs was faid to have greatly shaken the intereft and power of that fupreme favourite, prince Potemkin, who had long been confidered as paramount in the affairs of that empire.

That prince was not himfelf in the action, but as he had the unlimited government of thole regions, and the fole conduct of the war, he was liable of courfe to blame for mifadventure, and was charged in this inflance with fuffering the army to be furprized. There are two ill confequences that attend a glaring and habitual mifreprefentation of [K] 2 public public affairs, or a concealment of public loss; the one is, that if a true statement ever becomes neceffary it is not credited, and in cafe of concealment, that the lofs is always supposed and considered as being much greater than it really This was exemplified in the is. present instance. The accounts from Constantinople, as well as those through the medium of France, reprefented this as a formal and decifive battle, in which, they faid, that an army of 30,000 Ruffians had been totally defeated, and nearly cut to pieces. These are, however, as totally deflitute of all circumftances and incidents, as those from Peterfburgh; and are undoubtedly as faulty in one respect, as the latter in the other.

This extraordinary and unexpected refiltance of the Tartars occafioned, however, a great alteration in the scheme of the progress to Cherfon. It feems to have been greatly narrowed in the defign, to have been difencumbered of much of its intended fuperb magnificence; the great object of the coronation, and of the affumption of new titles, was entirely given up; the formidable military force that was expected did not attend; the procession did not take place until the following year; and the only end obtained, faving the conferences held with the king of Poland and the emperor, feemed to be nothing more than the empress's fnewing herfelf to the new fubjects, and appearing to take fome fort of formal poffeffion of Cherfon and the Crimea.

During the war thus carried on in those unmeasured and almost unknown regions, which seemed scarcely to know any particular owner, the Georgians were forely preffed by their ancient neighbours and eternal enemies the Lefghis Tartars; a nation as brave as themfelves, but who, being lefs civilized, were infinitely more ferocious. A fort of conflant war, generally confined to depredation and defultory incursion, had probably at all times fubfifted between them; but the great objects of religion, general liberty and fecurity, being now at flake with the Tartars, and the Georgians allies to their mortal enemy, the Lefghis, who were principal members of the confederacy, attacked them with a fury and effect before unknown. The Georgians, overborne and diftreffed in this war, looked in vain for protection from Ruffia; which was too much embarraffed and too diftant to afford any effectual aid; a circumftance which could not but be extremely vexatious to the latter, and the more fo, if the Georgians at this time (which feems probable) fubmitted to defeend from the flate of allies to that of vaffalage, in the hope of obtaining thereby the more fpeedy and effectual protection.

The court of Petersburgh feemed to vent her indignation entirely upon the Porte, for all the vexation which this and other untoward circumflances excited. The Ottomans were charged with being the fomenters of the war, or (what was a more favourite term) rebellion of the Tartars; and were to be made refponfible for their whole conduct. No great ceremony was ufed at Conflantinople upon thefe occafions; threats of war, and denunciations of the heavieft vengeance, were familiar. liar. Indeed, this haughty tone, with a high affumption of authority, only ufual to vaffals, is what the Ottoman pride has been conflantly doomed to fubmit to, ever fince its laft unfortunate and inglorious war.

No measures were, however, left untried, which could tend to reconcile the Tartars to the change that was meditated in their condition, and induce them to a voluntary fubmission to the Russian government. Repeated proclamations were iffued, affuring them of the most perfect fecurity to their religion, and the most unlimited freedom in the exercise of its rites; at the fame time, that they were to partake of all the temporal advantages which were enjoyed by the old fubiects of the empire. The old fubjects of the empire. empress likewife issued an ordinance which feemed calculated to afford immediate conviction how much their condition would be bettered under her government, by announcing, that in their address to her they were not, according to the eastern form, to style themselves her flaves, but merely, in the European manner, to fubscribe themselves her loyal subjects. But antient prejudices are not eafily fubdued; and it does not appear that this condefcenfion produced any great effect in allaying the obilinacy of the Tartars.

Some difcontent or jealoufy on the fide of the Chinefe occafioned their putting a temporary flop to the trade between Ruffia and that empire, which is their ufual mode of expressing diffatisfaction or refeutment. The caufe of this meafure was unknown at the court of Petersburgh; but as that commerce is confidered as being of the greateft importance to the empire, an embaffy was in contemplation to China, and the most speedy meafures, which the greatness of the diftance would admit, were adopted, in order to induce the court of Pequin to appoint commissioners to meet those of Ruffia upon the borders, and amicably to adjust the matters in difference. But while things were in this unfettled flate, advice was received of the death of Kienlong, the emperor of China, a prince defervedly little lefs than adored by his fubjects; and who, poffeffing all the excellencies to be wished for in a monarch and the father of his people, was no lefs diffinguished by the elegant accomplifhments of learning, philosophy, and poetry; in the latter of which he was confidered fo eminent, that translations of fome of his productions have been transmitted into Europe.

A new and fingular measure has been adopted by the empress of Ruffia, by which, reverfing the ufual order of things, instead of borrowing money from her fubjects, fhe becomes the great money-lender of Upon this principle the empire. fhe has opened a bank, whofe capital is to confift of 33 millions of roubles; and is empowered to emit bills, with the currency of money, to the amount of 100 millions more; (which, at the loweft effimate of the rouble, amounts to 20 millions sterling) but it is particularly reftricted from ever exceeding this prodigious emission of paper; which, indeed, feems more correspondent to the extent than to the wealth of the empire. Of the capital fund, twenty-two millions is to be lent to the nobleffe for the term of twenty years, upon mortgages on their effates, at an interest of five per cent. besides a payment of three per cent. which is to be applied annually towards the discharge of the original debt. The mortgages are not to include the whole eitates; but fuch a number of villages, with the peafants appertaining to them, as shall appear to the directors a fufficient fecurity; the peafants to be estimated at forty roubles; but we have no certain knowledge whether whole families or heads are thus rated. The mortgaged eflates are not subject to confiscation ; but heavy pecuniary mulcts arife upon any delay in paying either the five per cent. interest, or the three per cent. which is allotted to the difcharge of the principal; and if these mulcts are not fufficient to remedy the contumacy or neglect, the directors are to take the administration of the effate into their own hands. Four periods are flated in the course of the term, at any of which the borrower may redeem his eftate by paying off the remaining debt.

The remaining eleven millions of the capital are defined to the encouragement both of foreign commerce and of the internal trade of the empire, by being lent out to the merchants and retail dealers for the term of twenty-two years, at only four per cent. interest, with the fame annual application of three per cent. towards the difcharge of the principal. The bank is likewife to act as an infurance-office with respect to fire, but the houses must be built of ftone; and all foreigners, as well as natives, are admitted to the privilege of depositing their money in it, and of having the empress's royal word pledged to them as a fecurity. The ordinance for this effablishment conveys an admonition to the nobleffe, which will probably oblige many of them to become borrowers, however they may happen or not to approve of the conditions; for they are warned, that the emprefs having provided fuch a fund for their fupport, it is expected that they will be more punctual in fulfilling of their engagements than they have hitherto been; and that it is therefore ordered, that all who have given bonds, notes, or bills of exchange, and have failed in the payment, or who have contracted any debts whatever, shall be profecuted, without any diffinction of perfons, with the utmost rigour. As this admonition can only relate to debts owing to the crown, and that thefe must have arifen generally through the inability of the poorer part of the nobility or landholders to difcharge the taxes rifing on their effates as they became due, it follows that they muft borrow money at intereft from it with one hand, and pay it back at the fame inflant with the other : and that the inability being thus continually increasing, while the taxes remain always the fame, the eftates will in time become fo deeply involved, as to reduce the owners to abfolute dependence and beggary; the more effectially, as a provident forefight in the conduct of their affairs is perhaps lefs the characteriftic of that order of men in Ruffia, than even in other countries.

A bank founded on fome of thefe principles, corrected by certain modifications, might undoubtedly be very defirable, and productive of much benefit, in any country where the laws were fuperior to the will of the fovereign, and where the public were fecurity for the money, and for fulfilling the preferibed covenants.

But in a despotic governnants. ment, which ever carries the principles of inftability in its very nature, where the fhort but magic words " we will," are paramount to all laws, can in a breath overthrow all covenants, and cancel all obligations, and where the unfortunate fufferers dare not even to hint diflike, much lefs to claim right, or to complain of wrong, it will be eafily feen that fuch a measure is liable to be pregnant with danger and ruin to the people; and that it might be eafily converted to an engine for drawing much of the landed property, and the greater part of the money of the country, within the vortex of the crown.

The reigning duke of Courland has long been out of favour at the court of Peterfburgh, and being now reprefented or fuppofed to be in a precarious flate of health, it has afforded an opportunity of marching a body of Ruffian troops into that duchy, under the colour of fupporting the freedom of election in cafe of his demife; a pretence fufficient to excite the rifibility of thofe who are not too ferioufly affected by their intereft in the country to laugh at being reminded of its condition.

While the Grand Signior, in conformity with the circumflances of the empire, endeavoured in fome fort to reffrain the indignation excited by the continued threat and infult offered, and the never-ending claims and demands made by Ruffia, he, however, thought it neceffary to prepare his fubjects for that laft refort, which he well knew muft be the inevitable confequence of her views and conduct. He accordingly publifhed a fort of appeal to the people at large, and which was evidently intended to extend its effect to all believers whatever of the Mahometan doctrines, in which the language and colouring were fo ftrong, that he feemed not only to depart entirely from his usual caution and forbearance, but it appeared actually tantamount to a declaration of war. In this piece he reprefented his own invariable moderation, his inviolable adherence to faith and to treaty, the repeated wrongs and injuries which he had endured, the great concessions and facrifices he had made, particularly in fubmitting to the ufurpation of the Crimea and the adjoining provinces, through his anxious defire of preferving the public tranquillity, and fecuring his people from the numberless evils ever incident to war. That his defign and endeavours were fruttrated by the violence, injuffice, and rapacity of their enemies, by their repeated violation of faith and of treaties; their ambition being fo infatiate, that he no fooner fubmitted to their injuffice in one instance, however great the conceffion, than they immediately required others flill more exorbitant than the former. That they had fcarcely established their usurpations on the borders of the Black Sea, than they endeavoured to extend them into Afia, to countries fo remote that they could not pretend any connection with them; that having infidioufly prevailed on fome of his vaffals to depart from their allegiance, but being bravely repeiled by others, they had made it a ground of new quarrel with him. that he would not become the inftrument of punishing his subjects or friends for their fidelity and courage. He therefore called upon all true Muffulmen ferioufly to reflect upon their condition, to arm their bodies [A] 4. and

and their minds to withftand the approaching danger, and to be ready with hearts and with hands to fupport the ftandard of their prophet when it fhould be exalted; that it would not be a war of ambition but of felf-defence; that their religion and every thing dear were now at ftake, for that nothing lefs than the extermination of every thing Ottoman, and of all true believers, could fatisfy their inveterate enemies.

The most vigorous measures were at the fame time adopted for fuppreffing the diforders of the empire, regulating its internal affairs, and reducing the malcontents or rebels in the distant provinces, that its whole collected force, without domestic obstruction or embarrassment, might be brought to act in the common defence, when the arduous question of existence as a great people, or of final ruin, came to be decided at the point of the fword, and all hope must be centered in their own exertions to emulate the courage and virtue of their anceftors.

The bafha of Scutari, who had one of the braveft and fierceft nations of the empire, the autient Epirots, under his government, had for fome time been in a flate of open rebellion, or, if he did not abfolutely deny the fovereignty, totally rejected the authority of the Porte; waged continual and generally fuccefsful war with the bafhas of the adjoining countries, and committed the greateft ravage and cruelties in their governments, as well as his own.

But, however important this object was, there was another of much greater confideration. Egypt, the great granary of the empire, and the unfailing refource of its armies for provision, had long been in the most deplorable state. The country was torn to pieces and defolated by the endless contentions and wars between the rebel Beys; in which the people, befides fupporting their feveral armies, and fupplying their respective extortions, were exposed to all the ravage and devastation which they could have experienced from the most cruel foreign enemy. Murat Bey, and his party, had of late gained fo fupreme an afcendancy, that he was become in a great measure the absolute despot of that and was at least fo kingdom; without restriction in the Lower Egypt, which is fo much the most fruitful and wealthy part of the country.

This man was cruel beyond meafure, and, if possible, more rapacious than he was cruel; he poffeffed, in common with the Mamalucks in general, a fierce and unconquerable courage; inherited from nature all the qualities neceffary to form a great commander and conqueror; and had acquired, in the petty wars in which he was nurtured, no fmall portion of military addrefs and experience. He had of late extended his rapacity and oppression to the Europeans, extorted money from the merchants, and without regard to the laws and cuftoms of nations, or to the interests of a country formed by nature for commerce, treated the confuls with fuch contumely, if not violence, that the Christian residents at Conftantinople found themfelves under a necessity of applying, on the part of their respective nations, to that government for redrefs and future protection. The Porte have, however, fince. endeavoured to throw all the fault of these transactions upon the Ruffian conful at AlexAlexandria, who, they affert, had been the advifer and infligator of Murat Bey, in all the opprefion and injury offered to the Chriftians of the weftern nations of Europe. Nor do they ftop here, but infift, that all the troubles of Egypt had originated in the fame quarter, and that the fore-mentioned conful had been the agent in first exciting the Beys to rebellion, and then kept up the flame, by the conflant correfpondence between his court and them, of which he was the medium.

The hope of obtaining redrefs at Conftantinople feemed fmall indeed, when it was recollected that that government had neither influence or authority left in the country where the grievance fubfifted. The complaint ferved, however, perhaps, to rivet the attention of the Porte more closely to the subject of Egypt; for it feems to have been almost immediately after that Haffan Bey, the Captain Pacha, or Grand Admiral, laid the great defign of recovering that rich kingdom. His scheme, which was worthy of the founder, was not confined merely to the immediate reduction of that country ; it extended to its future establishment; to the annihilation of the Mamuluck race, (if fuch it might be called) by the total extinction of the order of the Beys, and by adopting those means which would prevent the pollibility of its revival; and when this effential bufinefs was performed, he intended to divide the country into five diffinct governments, under the immediate authority of the Porte, and all the officers of its own appointment. Thus would he have provided immense refources, not only of provisions but of money, for the fupport of the future war.

This bufinefs was conducted with fuch fecrecy and address, that the fmallest fuspicion was not entertained of the defign, until it was revealed in the execution. Two flects were equipped as usual for the Archipelago and the Black Sea; the Captain Pacha commanded the former. A train of artillery, with all the ftores and provisions necessary for an army, were already on board the fhips, and had been embarked with fuch dexterity, as to be totally unknown at Confrantinople. In the fame manner he drew twenty thousand troops on board, without observation or notice, part at the Dardanelles, part at Meteline, and part at Scio.

The Grand Admiral then proceeded directly for the Nile, and landed his forces at Rofetta, whither an army haftily collected was fent by the ufurper to attack him; but the enemy was totally routed, difperfed, and a great carnage made of The victor, purfuing his them. blow, advanced towards Grand Cairo, where Murat Bey, with his aifociate Ibrahim, at the head of a great army, composed of all the bravest Mamalucks, and the best troops of Egypt, were waiting to receive him. The enemy were fo vaftly fuperior in number, belides poffefling fome excellent cavalry. and fo confident in their own courage, that they defpifed the Turks. whom they confidered as a defined prey.

The battle took place in the approaches to that great city, on the fide of the fuburb of Boulah. The Captain Pacha, who never feemed fo much in his own element as in a field field of battle, led the way to victory. At feventy years of age that illustrious veteran threw himself into the front of the battle, and with all the ardour of youth rushed fabre in hand amidit the thickeft ranks of the His officers and troops, enemy. fired by the example, fell on with fuch fury, that nothing could withftand their impetuofity. To whatever fide the general directed his courfe, rout and difmay were immediately fpread around. No victory could be more complete. A prodigious flaughter was made, the fugitives totally dispersed, and every thing belonging to the enemy's camp became a tpoil. Grand Cairo became the immediate prize of victory; and the enemy had been fo confident of fuccefs, that confiderable treasures were obtained.

Murat and Ibrahim Bey had the fortune, through the excellency of their Arabian horfes, to escape to the Upper Egypt, after a long and fevere chace, in which they had more than once been in the utmost danger, and obliged to shift their courfe from one fide to the other of the river. The furviving Arablans who adhered to them had probably a principal fhare in this good fortune. Their efcape, however, prevented the Captain Pacha's triumph from being complete, his defign of eftablishing a new government from being carried into execution; and the rebel Beys again recovered in fuch a degree, that they were enabled to fupport a long, bloody, and dangerous war.

The joy and even transport which there vistories excited at Confuntinople, after for long and gloomy an age of de; radation and calamity, could not be eafily deferibed. Spoils and trophies were fuch new things, that the people could fearcely believe their eyes, and were nearly befide themfelves when they did; even the Porte could not conceal its triumph, and feemed to recover some part of its antient countenance. The apprehenfion and difmay which had long been provalent feemed to wear off, and an appearance of firmnefs and dignity to take place. Nor was the effect lefs upon its dangerous rivals, who were obferved to fall off confiderably from that haughty tone and authoritative language, which had been every day growing more familiar; and there feemed to be fome inftant recollection, that the manner of dictating to a vafial, and of conversing with an equal, was in fome respects different. Indeed this alteration in language and manner was fo obfervable, that it was popularly received as an evidence that all differences and jealoufies had been done away, and that concord and harmony were now to take place.

In all the turmoils and dangers of their fituation, the Porte did not relax in the defign of encouraging arts, fciences, and learning, among the people, and of opening a new day of knowledge to the Ottoman nation. Of this dispetition a ftriking inflance was given, in their going to the pains and expence of procuring proper perfons to undertake the great and very difficult tafk, of translating the voluminous French Encyclopedie into the Turkish language. And though the mufti and clergy made a violent opposition to this measure, as a kind of facrilege with refpect to their prophet and religion, yet the court feemed fo determined in its defign, as to emplay agents both in France and Italy, Italy, who were to ftand at no price in purchafing the old plates of that work, in order to illustrate the translation with copies of the original defigns.

The emperor is fo deeply engaged, or takes fo great a concern in all the affairs of Ruffia and the Porte, that any view of their political fituation in which he was not included would feem extremely defective. His conduct in the prefent year feemed, however, to be fo entirely regulated by that of the former, as to afford few marks of diffinction, and to leave but little room for particular observation. The loofe unfpecific claims about limits, and a new demarcation of them, intermixed with continually varying demands of the furrender of Belg-ade, and of different parts or the whole of the kingdom of Servia, and of Turkish Croatia and Bosnia, kept the ground open for conftant altercation and threat, and could not fail, when the occasion offered, to afford a colour for proceeding to any fudden extremity that feemed to promise advantage. It was observable, through this courfe of vexatious brangling, that the voice of the court of Vienna was alternately raifed or lowered, in direct unifon with that of the court of Peterfburgh. It had been supposed by many, who did not confider the little effect which fuch circumstances produce upon ambition, that the extraordinary perfonal attentions which the Turkish commanders and governors paid to the emperor, on his military tour this year along the frontiers, had greatly foftened if not entirely changed his difpolition with respect to the Ottomans. The Turks, indeed, withed, endeavoured, and would have done any thing that was not in a great degree ruinous to themfelves, to prevent his becoming a declared enemy; as it was that appreheufion which tied up their hands with refpect to Ruffia, or at leaft that readered her fo terrible to them. But the means of attaining that favourite point were not (unfortunately to them) within their reach. Formidable armies, equal refources, and a profperous flate of public affairs, were not to be gained by a wifh.

The emperor's attention was likewife, as ufual, engaged by a multiplicity of internal affairs. The completion, alteration, amendment, or retraction of his numberlefs projects, schemes of reform, institutions, regulations, and effablishments, prefented fo vaft and fo complex a mafs of matter, that its adjustment, and the endeavour to reconcile the heterogeneous and eternally clathing parts, feemed to go beyond the comprehension of any fingle mind. Yet the fertility of invention and genius that produced these, instead of being exhausted, scemed to become more prolific, and was continually increasing the magnitude of the mass, and of course adding to the number and greatnefs of the difficulties. The articles of ecclefiaffical reform and commercial regulation, branched out into the numberlefs ramifications that they were, feemed either of them ieparately to require the labour of an age, along with all the experience to be acquired in that time, for their completion and final effablifhment.

A greater and more difficult tafk even than thefe was, however, in hand. This was no lets than the abrogation of the old laws, and the ef.ablifhment of an entire new code, Legiflation Legislation is now become an object of emulation and ambition, as much as conqueft or victory. Frederic and Catharine opened the way; and there could be little doubt of their examples eftablishing a fathion. This code was at first greatly cried up for its humanity, from its having nearly or entirely excluded death from its fystem of punishment; but it was foon found that the commutations were, in many inflances, fo exceedingly fevere, that the most cruel death would have been, comparatively, an act of humanity and mercy. In fmaller crimes too, the punifhments are extremely fevere, and in many cafes degrading to human nature. But though a cold, auftere, and cruel principle feems to pervade the whole fystem, its greatest evil perhaps is, that the modes of trial are fo defective, and the inflictions fo arbitrary, that no innocency of life or character feem to afford a fufficient fecurity from the oppression of power, or the malice even of its inferior minifters.

Ecclefiaftical affairs, notwithftanding this great labour, continued still to occupy no small share of the emperor's attention. After the numberless reforms already made, it was still discovered that more was to be done; and new edicts and regulations were nearly as frequent as ever. One of these was an order in future for abridging the divine fervice, and for the entire fuppression of vocal performers in choirs; the medical professors having difcovered that this meafure would tend greatly to the health of the youth who were ufually employed as chorifters, and the political projectors, that it will afford them much time for application to ufeful fcience. — We believe this edict relates only to convents and the regular clergy, at leaft that it does not extend to cathedrals; although the wording of it renders the fenfe in that respect doubtful.

An edict was likewife iffued, commanding all rectors and parifh priefts to make use of the vernacular tongue, instead of the Latin language, in the administration of The chanting of the facraments. hymns in private houses was also thought an object of attention, and accordingly forbidden, as being introductory to innovations in religion, and likewife a check to in-This order is probably duftry. levelled at fome of the reformed congregations. Several proclamations were published, enforcing a former imperial decree for the abolifting of holidays; and to give them the more certain effect pecuniary mulcts were to be levied upon those magistrates who neglected to exact a compliance with them.

The prevalent difpolition for the reduction of the religious orders feemed this year to lofe fomewhat of its primary fpirit; the suppresfion of fix or feven chapters, with the convents of the capuchins, recollects, and dominicans, in Styria and Carinthia, and of the Francifcan friars at Vienna, being the only inftances we know of; the monastery of the latter has been converted into a fchool for foldiers children. It appeared, by an authenticated lift published this year, that 413 monasteries, and 211 nunneries, had been suppressed from the year 1782 to the prefent; and that the number of conventual clergy in the Austrian dominions, which, in the year 1779, amounted to to 64,890, was reduced fomething more than one-third.

But the court of Rome was deftined to receive a greater shock to its power in Germany from another quarter, than all perhaps that it had yet fuftained from the emperor. The German prelacy, taking advantage of his disposition, feem determined not to lofe the golden opportunity, which they fo often before fought in vain, of calling in the great official powers lodged in his hands, to act in concurrence with their own, in emancipating themfelves entirely from the Italian voke in the administration of ecclefiastical affairs. The right assumed by the pope of interference in their metropolitan government had nearly at all times, as well long before, as at and fince the period of the reformation, been confidered, and even fometimes floutly refifted by the German bishops, not only as an intolerable grievance, but as a grofs invation of their rights, and a badge of fervitude which they very unwillingly wore.

The refidence of nuncios, who were the pope's immediate inftruments, and the ecclefiaftical jurifdiction which they affumed, were confidered as fumming up in themfelves the whole amount of the grievance, and as being the standing monuments of the wrong and oppreffion complained of. This was accordingly that part of the evil which it was in contemplation firft to shake off. The emperor, notwithstanding all his reforms, still permitted the continuance of the nuncio at Vienna, which was probably in reverence to the memory and character of the late empress queen, whole attachment to the holy fee was univerfally known; but he was not permitted at all to interfere in ecclefiaftical affairs, and was confidered and treated merely as a political agent or refident from the pope. Another nuncio had been eftablifhed at Cologne, in the time of the late elector, and his continuance had hitherto been permitted by the prefent, although he aflumed an authority, which only ferved to revive and increafe the diflike to that character, both with the reigning prince and with his ecclefiaftical neighbours.

In this state of things, the bigotry of the fecular court of Munich would go to counteract or overthrow the defigns of the ecclefiaftical princes, who were the only competent judges of their own rights and privileges, and of those things which related to or affected their government, whether temporal or ecclefiaftical, by officioufly inviting a nuncio to refide in that city, with a view to his affuming a fupreme ecclesiastical jurisdiction over Bavaria and the Palatinate, under the immediate fanction of the electoral power. Upon the first intelligence of this defign, the elector of Mentz, and the archbishop of Saltzburg, took the alarm, and immediately applied to the emperor for his official interpolition and protection in the prefervation of their rights.

- That prince accordingly published throughout the empire a document under the title of a memorial, upon the fubject; in which, after reciting the application, and the motives to it, he acknowledges it to be his duty, as the fupreme patron of the Germanic confitution in church and flate, to grant the protection required; and that as he had never failed in any inflance in giving the fullest proofs of his patrictic triotic zeal for the welfare and fupport of both, fo it behoved him in the prefent, as a good friend to his molt gracious brother and affociate, the elector of Mentz, not only to maintain the rights of bithops within their refpective diocefes, but alfo to contribute, with all his might, to their recovering all fuch rights as they had been originally entitled to, of which they have been diipofleffed for many centuries, and the lofs of which was occafioned by temporary accidents, and unwarrantable encroachments.

That he was therefore refolved to make known to the whole empire, in the clearest and most explicit manner, his way of thinking on that fubject; and also to declare to the court of Rome, that he will never fuffer any prelates of the empire to be any ways annoyed in the free exercife of their metropolitan rights, which they hold from God and the church; that he means to look on the nuncios as fo many envoys from the pope, both in political matters, and in fuch cafes as more immediately concern him as head of the church : that he abiolutely cannot permit their having in future any jurifdiction in ecclefiastical matters, nor can he allow them to prefide in any private court of judicature. He then earneally exhorts the prelates, in the terms of dearly beloved, that as he thus imparts to them his real fentiments, they will, on their fide, refit all attempts upon their metropolitan rights, as well as those of their fuffragans, and fternly to oppofe all encroachments and ufurpations which the court of Rome might be guilty of against their rights and government: in doing which he gives them the most positive asfurances of the imperial protection in its utmost extent.—He concludes by declaring, that he will be strictly attentive to all questions concerning benefices, in order to keep up to the very letter the ecclesiaftical conflictutions peculiar to the Germanic body.

It was not very long after the publication of this memorial, when. at a conference held by the ecclefiaffical princes of the empire at Ratifbon, the following refolutions were debated, and (according to the most authentic information we are able to procure) received the affent of the convention.-To withdraw themfelves entirely from the jurifdiction of the pope in their ecclefiaftical government.-To acknowledge no other fupreme than the emperor .- To revive the antient complaints of the German nation against the encroachments of the holy fee; and to claim his protection for the reftoration of all their former rights to the German bishops .- And, to establish new regulations relative to ecclefiaftical difcipline.

Thus did the rafh and untimely interference of a mifguided prince in its favour accelerate that final overthrow to the power of the court of Rome, which might otherwife, perhaps, have been yet for fome time longer evaded; and thus was an end put, in the year 1786, to that domination in Germany, which fie had for fo many ages fucceflively maintained.

The emperor, notwithftanding the multiplicity of his objects of reform, did not overlook even the focieties of free-mafons; upon thofe in his German dominions he impofed feveral reftrictions which muft to them be exceedingly grievous; and and though he acknowledged himfelf totally ignorant of their myfteries, (an ignorance which he declared his full determination of continuing in) and acknowledged his having known or heard of benefits arifing from the inftitution, yet the language of the regulations conveyed implications of an odious or degrading nature against them. Their focieties in Germany, befides being very numerous, abounding with names of high rank and confideration, great interest was used to prevent the obnoxious paffages from making their way into the world, by propofing to fubilitute other terms, which would produce the fame effect, without the fting of implication; but no relaxation whatever could be obtained, and the edict was published in its original form. Their brethren in the Netherlands were, however, still lefs fortunate, the order there being entirely abolished (fo far as power could reach to do it) and their future affembling prohibited.

This prince, belides the fignal benefits which he had before conferred on the Jews, engaged fo warmly this year in their favour, as to write letters himfelf to the different trading and handycraft corporations of Vienna, requeiling that their youth might be received as apprentices in the various trades and callings of that city.

The ruinous vice of gaming, fo deftructive in all places, and fo difficult, if not impoffible, to be entirely reftrained in any, has, poffibly from that very circumftance, excited the indignation of Jofeph (who will not admit any difficulty to ftand in the way of reform) in the higheft degree. All games of chance are particularly prohibited under the feverest penalties; and fo rigidly is the law enforced, that eleven officers of grenadiers were, in a fingle inflance, not only deprived of their commissions, but degraded to the humiliating condition of ferving in the ranks as common foldiers: a punishment which we hitherto conceived to have been peculiar to the Russian fervice.

It would have been more curious. if there had not been previous inftances of it, that the emperor, who in the commencement of his reign held out fuch unlimited freedom, as well as protection to the prefs, should now iffue an order totally forbidding any mention whatever of the Germanic league, or of the exchange of Bavaria, in any publication within his dominions. It was, however, rendered rather fingular by the circumflance that a celebrated court writer had just finished and prepared for the press an elaborate treatife, intended to overthrow every thing that had ever been advanced, whether against the proposed exchange, or in juftification of the Germanic league.

The usual disposition to new arrangement, or perhaps, with more propriety, the ufual prevalent defire of rendering every thing within his dominions perfectly Auftrian, as well with refpect to arrangement as government, the one habitually preparing the people by degrees to flide the more easily into the other, appeared this year in the Netherlands, as we have feen it before did in Hungary. Thefe confined provinces are to be apportioned into circles; but as Germany in its antient and most extended flate was circumferibed within ten circles, in a corner of one of which thele were then then included, fo, in due gradation, the Netherlands are now to be comprised in nine. By this means the people in each circle will not only be admitted into the enjoyment of fuch portion of fplendour and happinefs as may be fuppofed incident to a diffinct government, but they will likewife (as it is fondly conceived) by degrees lofe all vexatious recollection of their former governments and condition; for it cannot be forgotten, how great are the effects of terms, as diftinguished from ideas, both in facilitating the government of mankind, and in rendering them intractible to it. The Auftrian Lombardy is to undergo a fimilar arrangement, and to be tortured into eight divisions; which will undoubtedly ferve to increase the local felf-importance of the people, however deficient it may prove in extending their improvements, or in promoting their prosperity.

The fpirit of innovation continues still to shew itself in Hungary in fmall matters as well as in great, of which a fresh instance was given in removing the courts of juffice, and the feat of government, from Prefburgh back to Buda, the antient capital of that kingdom, from which they had been removed about two centuries ago, upon that city's falling into the hands of the Turks. It is, however, to be obferved, that Buda feemed defigned by nature for being the capital of that country; that its fituation is much more centrical than that of Prefburg; and that the motive for a predilection for the latter could only proceed from its vicinity to Vienna, by which it was immediately under the eye of the court.

It was not to be expected that the fame keen eye, from which no other object of regulation could escape, would suffer the numerous body of profitutes in Vienna to pass unnoticed. They are now compelled to take up their refidence in four large buildings affigned for the purpofe, and are totally difqualified from appearing in the ftreets in their professional character. A suppressed convent is faid to be one of the buildings affigned to this order of nuns.-Such is the mixture of burlefque which accompanies this activity of regulation, both civil and religious!

But notwithftanding the multiplicity of domeftic bufinefs in which the emperor feemed entirely immersed, it did not prevent his paying the most watchful attention to the affairs and distractions of Holland. It was not, however, underflood, that he furveyed the condition of that republic by any means with a friendly eye. On the contrary, difputes were raifed relative to the navigation of the Swin, and every petty occasion feized which could afford room for dispute. At the fame time, a public requeft made by the flates general to the government of the Auftrian Netherlands, for liberty to export Dutch herrings to Oftend, was rejected by the emperor himfelf, in terms the most peremptory as well as laconic that could be devifed.

In defiance of the fo lately concluded treaty of peace, and apparently of friendship, a new and ferious claim was likewise prepared, and ready to be enforced when the proper season arrived. This was a renewal of the claim upon the East India trade, which a Mr. Rancour was employed to justify in a treatife published for the purpose. This This writer was not content to reft the justice of the claim upon the natural and inalienable rights of the Austrian Netherlands to a share in that commerce, but he undertook to prove that those rights had been confirmed and established, not only by the treaty of Munster and all former ones, but by the late treaty of 1785, one of whose principal objects, on one fide, had been entirely to do away that claim, and thereby finally close the difpute.

HERE was no event that marked the year of which we treat in fuch firiking and indelible colours, as the death of the Vol. XXVIII. great Frederick, the illustious king of Prussia. If he was not the founder of an empire, he accomplished a more arduous task than even that, [L] under under its usually concurrent circumftances, has generally proved : for, furrounded as he was by great and jealous potentates, poffessed of immenfe standing armies, and at a time when difcipline and the art of war were fuppoled to have been already carried to their ultimate point of perfection, he, merely by the powers of superior genius and ability, raifed a fcattered, ill-forted, disjointed dominion, into the first rank of power, glory, and renown; and the newly-founded kingdom of Pruffia foon became, under his aufpices, the terror or admiration of mankind.

But though he must always be confidered as one of the greatest captains and mafters of the art of war that ever lived, and as having carried military difcipline and field evolution to a degree of perfection before unthought of, and which is now the great object of imitation with all martial nations; his mind was too comprehensive, and his genius too vaft, to be confined to tactics, or the business of the field; and he fhone forth at the fame time with no lefs ambition of fame, in all the different characters of legiflator, hiftorian, poet, and philofopher.

In the courfe of his long and exceedingly hard fought wars, contending against a combination of power which has feldom been equalled, and with fome of the first generals and greatess the first gemost distance with unfailing conflancy, and an unconquerable fortitude, the most distant reverses of fortune that perhaps have ever been experienced and recovered by any commander; he having been repeatedly and fuddenly depressed from the highest pinnacle of fuccess to the loweit extreme of diffrefs and adverfity; infomuch, that even the continuance of his exiftence as a fovereign was more than once a queftion fufficiently dubious. Through a noble perfeverance, and the ftrenuous exertions of his admirable genius, he fill furmounted his difficulties and dangers: fortune again fmiled, and feemed only to plunge him in adverfity, that he might rife with brighter glory.

In estimates of real character we must necessarily take mankind fuch as they are, compounds of good and of evil, of great and of little; we should in vain lock for refemblances to those imaginary heroes, who are reprefented as fo bedizened with virtues, that nothing like nature or truth can be perceived about them; and the picture exhibits, as the poet happily observes, " those faultlefs monsters which the world ne'er faw." On the contrary, the shades in Frederick's character were as ftrongly marked as the bright parts, and we fhall perhaps find that his great qualities had even more than their due proportion of alloy. There certainly have been great captains and conquerors, who afforded fuperior inftances of a noble and generous nature to any that he had the fortune of exhibiting; who were happily better calculated to excite the affection as well as the admiration of mankind; and who were free from many of the defects of his character .--- To fay that his ambition was boundlefs, would be no more than faying that he held the vice common to great fituations; but his ambition afforted too much with rapacity to captivate the imagination, as it otherwife might have done; and he looked more to his interest than his fame in the means means which he fometimes used for the attainment of his objects. A itrict æconomy, indeed, was indifpenfably necessary to the peculiarity of his lituation, and to the support of fuch prodigious armies, with means which would have been totally inadequate in any other hands; but he puthed this virtue too far towards the opposite extreme, fo as to carry too much the appearance of a degrading parfimony; and it muft be acknowledged, by those who pay the greatest respect to his eminent qualities, that he was more fond of gold than corresponds with the eftablished ideas of a great man.

Frederick could brook no oppofition to his will either in word or in action; was to the last degree implacable in his refentments; and inheriting from nature, as well as deriving from education and example, a disposition extremely harsh, defpotic, and occasionally cruel, it could not be expected that it would have been leffened by the horrors and carnage of war, any more than by the continual perfonal enforcement in peace of that auftere military discipline established by himfelf, which was as unequalled in its rigour and feverity, as in all other refpects; and by which, man being reduced to the flate of a living machine, was confidered and treated merely as luch.

But the latter part of his life feemed calculated to make amends to mankind for all the ravage and defolation which his ambition had occafioned in the foregoing; to give a new colour to his charafter; and to caft a foftening fhade of benignity over all its parts. He became the father as well as the legiflator of his fubjects; and to them the milk of human nature feemed o/erflowing in his composition. The extraordinary expences to which he went in peopling and cultivating the sterile or defart waites which extended over fuch vaft tracts of his dominions, were only limited by the extent and number of the objects to which they were applicable. For though his attention was in a confiderable degree directed to almost every branch of improvement, yet agriculture was his great and favourite object; and he accordingly adopted every measure that could render the hufbandman eafy and comfortable in his circumftances, and fecure in the possession of his property. And if he deferves praife for having attained thefe ends in the latter and more ferene parts of his career, it must furely be confidered as the greater glory of his reign, and one peculiar to himfelf, that when most unfortunate in war. and when most oppressed by an unequalled combination of hollile power, yet, that in all the fingular diftreffes to which he was at those feafons reduced, his provident forefight had provided fuch ample refources for every evil that could enfue, that he never burthened his fubjests with the addition of a fingle tax, or the demand of a benevolence; fo that his dominions, if it had not been for the cruel depredations of his numerous enemies, would have borne the fame appearance as in a feafon of profound peace.

And when, latterly, the dreadful inundations and other calamittus effects of unufual and untoward leafons, had fpread ruin and defolation as well through his dominions, as all the regions of the north and center of Europe, the fums of money which he beftowed, not merely to relieve but to reftore the numberlefs fufferers, and, as it werc, [L] z com-completely to remedy the evils of nature, were fo immenfe, as nearly to exceed credibility; and perhaps exceeded any former known inflance of roval benevolence. It feemed indeed fcarcely credible, that the fame hand which had fo long been charged with a contracted parfimony, fhould now, when the great occafion offered, exceed all others in munificence and bounty. It must likewife ever be received as a flanding monument both of attention to the good of his fubjects, and of the excellent principles of his adminiftration, that notwithstanding the length and peculiar circumstances of his wars, the population of his dominions had been more than doubled in his reign, and that a far greater proportional increase took place in their foreign trade, and in the number and tonnage of their fhipping.

As we never had before, and as our age will hardly again afford us an opportunity of deferibing another fuch man, we are the lefs apprehenfive of having dwelt too long upon fo favourite a fubject.

This great prince departed the prefent life on the 17th of August, 1786, in the 75th year of his age; a furprifing age, whether we confider it with respect to the greatness, number, and splendour of its actions, the dangers to which it had been exposed, or the unequalled exertions of body and mind, by which, through a long reign of more than forty-fix years, it had been continually exhausted.

His decline had for fome time been fo rapid, that the event was eafily forefeen; yet, under the joint preflure of an afthma, dropfy, and lethargy, the former of which had for fome time rendered him incapable of repofe in a bed, he dif-

played in the intervals his priftine vigour of mind, and all his ufual ferenity and chearfulnefs in converfation; never uttering the leaft complaint, nor fhewing the fmalleft degree either of regret or impatience at his condition; and on the 15th, only two days before his death, he fent for his cabinet fecretaries at four o'clock in the merning, and transfacted businets for three hours with them; but in the evening of that day the formolency returned, and he continued nearly in a fate of infenfibility until his death.

It was a curious if not fingular circumflance, that as the king began himfelf perfonally to feel the infimities and incommodities of age, it touched his fympathy fo ftrongly for the diftreffes of the unprovided in that calamitous condition', that he immediately founded two hofpitals in Berlin for the reception of helplefs old age, in all cales whatever, without regard to nation, religion, or fex.

There were numerous other inflances of his temper and difpolition being greatly foltened by age; a circumflance very unufual in mankind, and almost without example in conquerors; who fo generally become more rigid, harfh, and opprefilve, and too frequently degenerate into abfolute cruelty at that feafon of life.

The attention of all Europe had been long drawn to the contemplation of this expected event, and of its probable or poliible confequences. Many apprehended that it would prove the fignal for immediate war, and perhaps lead to great political revolution. The character of his nephew and fucceffor, the prefent king, was not yet much developed; and it was cafily feen that a new kingdom which which had rifen fuddenly to fuch unexampled power and greatness as ferved to excite the jealouf, or apprehenfion of all its neighbours, merely through the abilities of one man, would - quire abilities not much interior to withitand the thocks, t which it might be linble u an ine lots of its tutelary guarde n and genius. The danger appear d the greater, as its nearest and most potent neighbour, befides other great political differences, and his finding Pruffit almost constantly in his way in the profecution of his ambitious views, was himself the greatest fufferer by her greatnefs; and was well known to be of a character not much difpoled to forgive or forget to grievous a lofs as that of Sileha.

The new government was, however, conducted with fo much regularity and fleadinefs, and retained fo much of its ancient appearance and character, that no opening was made, nor encouragement given, for any of the apprehended dangers or evils to take place. Indeed the late king had bequeathed the most effectual fecurities to his fucceffor for the prefervation of his dominions, which human wildom could provide or devife, by leaving him a full treafury, the fineft army, without exception, in the world, and a people enthuliaftically attached to his government and memory. A ftriking inftance of the latter was afforded in the disposal of his old wardrobe, which was fo meanly provided, that the whole, including state clothes and linen, was fold to the Jews for 400 rix-dollars *; but the eagerness of the people to possifies any thing that had once belonged to their old hero was fo great, that the Jews made niore than as many thoutands of their purchaie; and the imatient article of his wear was preferved as an invaluable relick.

As novelty poficilies charms that captivate all mankind, to innovations, in a certain degree, are perhaps adopted with propriety at the accellon of a new fovereign, efpecially after a long reign; and whateve the wildom of the preceding administration may be, there ever will be particular inflances in which they may be neceffary, and accordingly adopted with advantage. Popularity was likewife the more necellary in the prefent inftance, not only from the predilection of the people for the late reign, but that the prefent fovereign had hitherto no opportunity of difclofing his public difposition and character.

No event or act of the late reign was fo univerfally unpopular throughout Germany, as his predilection for the French language, and the decided preference which he upon all occafions gave to the literature of that nation. The numerous German literati in particular could not but be grievoully affected by it, and indeed every true patriot, from whatever part of that wide empire he derived his exiftence, mult have felt it fenfibly, as an infult offered, and a glaring contempt shewn to his language and country. This predilection the king derived from his early acquaintance and intercourfe with French poets and philosophers of the modern ftamp, to whom he was likewife indebted for other prejudices and principles fill more injurious and unfortunate; particularly that indifference (to call it by the foftest name) with respect to religion, which fluck to him through line, and was the great blemish of his character.

It must, however, be remembered, that the German writers in the late king's earlier days, were of a very different cast and character from those who have fince fo far advanced literature and fcience, have done fo much honour to their country by their genius and refearches, and who by their fuccefsful introduction of the poetic muses have used the most effectual means for foftening and wearing down the roughness of their native tongue. On the contrary, at and for a confiderable time after his acceffion, laborioufnefs and fidelity were the chief praifes that could be beftowed on the German writers ; their works were proverbially verbole and heavy; they had not yet applied with any fuccefs to the Belles Lettres; and their poetry, particularly the dramatic, was barbarous. Early prejudices are with difficulty shaken off, and as life advances, the difposition to that endeavour generally leffens. Frederick had early made himfelf a party in the affair, by criticifms on, and himfelf writing againft, the German fludies and literature. Having thus declared himfeli, he was too proud and too tenacious of his opinion ever to relinquifh it, and would neither observe or examine the wonderful change and improvement which was taking place in both. And fo far was he from affording favour or encouragement to the writers who were thus reforming the language and tafte of their country, that it is faid, he would not even read their productions if in the vernacular tongue.

Nothing then could be more popular, or more generally gratifying, than the new king's declaration in council, that " Germans we are, and Germans I mean we fhall continue;" at the fame time giving directions that their native language should refume its natural rank and station, from which it had been for near half a century degraded by the usurping French; the latter only having been during that time spoken at court, addressed in letters to the king, ufed in all public offices and transactions, and even in the academies. Of thefe, the royal academy of fciences was composed almost entirely of Frenchmen; but the king now ordered three Germans to be received in it, and public difcourfes to be occafionally delivered in the Teutonic. To fhew his attention to the native literature, he fettled a handfome penfion for life upon Mr. Ramler, the celebrated German lyric poet; and received in the most favourable manner the congratulatory verfes which were addreffed to. him by professor Gleim, and other men of learning, who all made it a point to write them in the native language. The late king had likewife placed the collection of the taxes and duties, particularly those on tobacco, almost exclusively in the hands of Frenchmen ; but they were now generally, if not univerfally, replaced by Germans, and the foreigners humanely allowed penfions.

The new king firifuly prohibited all publications tending to excite a contempt or indifference for religion : observing that he had marked with great concern the progress of implety impiety and prophanenefs on the one hand, and of enthusiasm on the other, which were making fuch rapid advances among the people; and which he attributed in a great degree to the multiplicity of these publications. He declared that he would not have his fubjects corrupted either by fanatics or atheifts; nor madmen to enrich themselves and the bookfellers at the expense of religion. He likewife paffed a fevere law againft duelling in all cafes whatever; and erected a court or tribunal of honour to take cognizance of those disputes or differences which might lead to that refort.

Upon the whole, every thing that has yet appeared ferves to indicate a happy and prosperous reign to that kingdom; and as the monarchy is now thoroughly formed and established, if it should not prove fo fplendid as the foregoing, it will be fo much the better for the people.

So happy a tranquillity prevails in the other parts of Germany, that the perfecution of the freemasons by the elector palatine became an object of notice. That prince, who feems in many refpects to have departed ftrangely from that conduct and character which gained him fo much applaufe during his refidence at Manheim, adopted, towards the close of the preceding year, a determination to exterminate free-majonry entirely from his dominions; nor could even the protection of the mufes fave the academy of fciences at Munich from this fpirit of barbarous perfecution.

The celebrated M. de Born of Vienna, one of the most distinguished literary characters in Germany, was a refident member of that academy, and had a principal fhare in retrieving it from that flate of degradation in which it had fallen, during that long night of ignorance and bigotry, which fo peculi-arly overfpreads Bavaria. That gentleman was a known and avowed free-mason; and the prefident was obliged to write to him, defiring peremptorily that he should within eight days declare, whether he would renounce and withdraw himfelf from the pernicious myfteries of that fraternity. To this M. de Born returned an immediate answer, " That so far from relin-" quifhing the principles, he fhould "ever glory in the name of free-" mafon : a name that fhould mark " every man that bears it with fu-" perior probity; for its principles " enjoin a more vigilant discharge " of the duties we owe to our Crea-" tor, a more firict fidelity to the " fovereign, and a more enlarged " and active benevolence to our " fellow creatures, in squaring our " conduct thereby. However, to " free myself at once from your " jurifdiction, I herewith return " you all my diplomas, and defire " you may strike out my name from " the lift of your academicians." Thus has the acadamy loft its principal ornament and honour, and Bavaria may again enjoy its usual darknefs and proverbial flupidity.

The two northern kingdoms have not prefented much matter of political obfervation in the courfe of the year of which we treat. The famine and other calamities which fo much afflicted the people in both kingdoms, were rather increafed than diminished in this year; and though every where grievous, were in the more remote or detached provinces provinces of either dreadful to contemplate. Even in those parts of Denmark, which were the beft fituated for receiving foreign aid and fupply, and in the very feat of government, which afforded the beft means for procuring it, the wants of the people were, notwithstanding, fo extreme, that it was effimated, that above a thouland artificers emigrated from the city of Copenhagen only in the courfe of the year. And the emigration from other parts of the kingdom was fo great, that not lefs than feven or eight thouland of the most laborious and ufeful part of the people applied to the Ruffian minifler, within only the first three months of the year, for those encouragements and means of transportation which were allotted to those who would proceed to people Cherfon, and other of the new colonies and fettlements in those quarters. If fuch was the condition in the heart of Denmark, how muft it have been in the remote provinces, and still more in those of Sweden, which are farther from relief, and more fhut in from the world?

The refufal of the cultomary fupplies of grain from Livonia, which fo dreadfully and irremediably increafed the diftreffes of the people, could not but fink deeply into the mind of the court of Stockholm. A visible coolness and jealousy had for fome time been growing, and feemed much increasing, between Sweden and the court of Peterfburgh. Befides any other caufes of coolnefs, jealoufy, or fufpicion, the king kept his army in better condition, and went greater lengths in improving and increasing his naval force, than could at all be pleafing to his great and ambitious neighbour. Indeed, however, fhe may be fuppofed to confider abfolute power, when vefted in her own hands, she was little fatisfied with that revolution which placed fo great a fhare of it in his ; and however neceffary it was to conform outwardly to an evil which was not apprehended until it was too late for a remedy, it was not to be supposed that fo unthought of and eminent a difplay of dexterity and dangerous ambition, fhould at all lesien her watchfulness of his future conduct, or in any degree difpofe her to regard him with the lefs jealous eye.

Whether it proceeded from an apprehension of any approaching foreign danger, from the diffresses of the people, or from a complication of these with other causes, is uncertain, but a diet was this year held at Stockholm, be-May 1786. ing the first that had taken place fince that which confirmed the late revolution in the government eight years before.---The greatest apparent cordiality prevailed between the king and the flates at this meeting. In his fpeech to them fome oblique hints were thrown out, in treating of the flate of the army and navy, of the propriety and necessity of being in fuch a ftate of preparation and defence, as would afford fecurity against any finister events that might occur, which could only be underflood as alluding to one of his neighbours, the greatest harmony having been already declared to fubfift with Denmark.

The flates were not, however, fo compliant as might have been expected; and it was not a little pleafing to fee, that the fpirit of liberty which fo much diftinguifhed their antient conflitution was not yet yet entirely extinct, for as where that fpirit is wanting no fystem of laws or conftitution of polity, however excellent, will make a nation free, fo while it fubfifts with any vigour, no form or power of government can at all times be able to withstand its fuccefsful exertion; especially if the former, according to the nature of abfolute or ill-reftrained fovereignty, fhould, under a weak or profligate prince, degenerate into tyranny. The flates at this time feemed to recall and recover their conftitutional importance, by refufing abfolutely to comply with fome of the not numerous propofals which the king made to them, and on which he had particularly fixed his mind. Thefe were for the establishment of some funds, the nature of which we are not informed of, and confequently can give no opinion of the propriety of the refufal, but merely give the fact as an inftance of the power or fpirit which the flates of Sweden still retain. The smallest diffatisfaction was not, however, vifible on either fide; and the king and the flates parted, after a very fhort feffion, with as much apparent cordiality as they had thewn at their first meeting.

To the numerous inflances of improvements in legiflation, or the adminification of jultice in different parts of the weftern world, which we have already had the fatisfaction of taking notice, and which will fo happily diffinguifh the prefent from all former ages, the king of Sweden has added another, by totally abolifhing within his dominions that inhuman relick of antient barbarity and cruelty, the punifhment by torture; or, what was ftill worfe, its horrible and fruitlefs application for the difcovery of truth, by compelling fuspected delinquents, through an extremity of pain, which human nature is not capable of withstanding to condemn themfelves, by the acknowledgment of a guilt of which they have frequently been entirely The king, in his edict, innocent. affigns motives pretty much of this nature for its abolishment; and to fupply the fuppofed necessity for putting the queffion, as it was called, he ordains, that the confeffion of guilt in a malefactor shall not at all be deemed neceffary for his punishment, where the legal proofs of his guilt are fufficiently eftablifhed.

The repeated failures, or diftreffes approaching clofely to what is understood by mercantile failure, which the European companies trading to the East Indies have of late years to particularly experienced, feem to bear a doubtful if not ominous alpect with respect to the future existence of that commerce, which has fo long been the great object of avidity to trading communities, and of rivalship and contention among flates; and which has likewife afforded the means of producing the most deplorable calamities among the remoteft nations in the world, and with whom Europe feemed to have the leaft poffible concern. The flocks which the English company had received, notwithstanding the greatness of its territorial poffessions and revenues, are too well known to require obfervation. The Dutch Eafl India Company, which had for ages held unexampled wealth and power, and feemed rather a great independent fovereign, than a member of a fmall republic, has now of late been more than once reduced to the very extremity of diffrefs, and has only been held together by the great loans which the flate has advanced to fave it from abfolute and impending ruin. France has already, in the fhort interval fince the peace, twice or thrice altered her plan for conducting that commerce, and does not yet feem by any means fixed in her fystem. The Danish company, being entirely commercial, and conducting its uffairs upon a narrower fcale, feemed free from many of those dangers to which the more potent and adventhrous companies were necessarily exposed. Yet neither the prudence of their conduct, nor the moderation of their purfuits, could preferve them from the common fatality; and they found their affairs this year in fo untoward a state, that they were under a necessity of furrendering their charter, privileges, and stock, into the hands of the king, who they requested to accept of them on fuch terms as he fhould prefcribe. The king has accordingly complied with their request, and agreed to purchase their respective shares of stock at a given price, and in a flipulated manner.

With respect to other matters, nothing of any confequence has taken place in the affairs of Denmark. The prince royal retains his popularity, and feems to deferve it; and the people (which is the beft of all tefts) appear to be fatisfied with their government. The prince feems much disposed to confult their inclinations in his conduct; and lately rejected a propofal that was made to him for laying fome new reftraints on the prefs; obferving, that as it was impoffible to prevent men from thinking, fo, in defiance of all refirictions and laws, they would ever find fome means of communicating their fentiments, and the more publicly that was done, the lefs pernicious or dangerous would be the eftect. The prince had the fatisfaction this year of feeing his fifter, the princefs royal, married at an early age to the prince of Slefwic IJoltein.

The hereditary prejudices and animofities which have fo long operated, with all the force of a natural antipathy, upon the people and even the fovereigns of the northern kingdoms, feems to be wearing faft away. Indeed, as a clearer view of their mutual and respective interefts, as well as of their common danger, takes place, these prejudices, which had been formed upon a totally different fcale of things, and under caufes and impressions which no longer exift, muft of neceffity decline. The greatest harmony accordingly fublifts, and if true policy prevails must continue and increase, between the northern crowns and kingdoms.

We omitted in its proper place to take notice of a great and royal work executed in Denmark, being no lefs than the forming of a fhort and direct junction between the Baltic and the German ocean. This was done by drawing a navigable canal from welt to east across the peninfula of Jutland, the ancient Cimbrian Chersonese. This canal was opened in the month of May 1785, and accompanied with an edict, by which a paffage through it was granted to all nations (on the payment of certain specified tolls or duties) for fix years; a limitation as to time for which we do not pretend to fee the motive. Neither can we, as we have feen no fcale of this canal, nor any account of its dimensions dimensions with respect to breadth or depth, form any accurate effimate of its probable utility; which, from its nature, should be great indeed.

The new treaty of navigation and commerce between France and England, which was concluded at Veriailles on the 20th of September 1786, may be justly confidered among the most important political events of the prefent year. It feemed almost fingular, that this treaty was far from affording general fatistaction to the people on either fide of the water; and that each nation appeared to think that it had granted too much to the other, or had even been overreached by it in fome parts of the compact, and particularly in the rating and adjustment of the equivalents: a circumdance, however, which may be confidered as affording no flight indication of its being founded on liberal and equitable principles, efpecially taking the numerous and deeply rooted prejudices which it had on both fides to encounter into the estimate.

In fact, the multiplicity of objects which it embraced, of interests which it might affect, its relation to the general system of navigation and trade established in Europe, its interference with the letter or fpirit of treaties already exifting between the parties and other powers, and the uncertainty of its future operation in all or many of these respects, prefented altogether such a face of doubt and difficulty, that the most intelligent in mercantile affairs were either at a lofs to form, or unwilling to hazard a decided opinion, while men in general were either bewildered in the magnitude of the fubject, or involved in the apprchention of the manner in which it might affect their own peculiar interefts.

It is to be observed, that this was not a novel idea with either of the parties; and that the gencral principles of the prefeut treaty were the fame with those of a former one which had been rejected by the English parliament in the year 1713. The courts of London and Vertailles had then abiolutely agreed upon the conditions; it was a part of the fystem of the tory ministry who concluded the peace; and it only wanted the fanction of parliament for its final completion, But all the weight and influence of the court, with that of the flrong party which then predominated, notwithitanding their utmost exertions to carry it through, were foiled in the attempt. It fhould, however, be remembered, that the violent prejudices which were then entertained by the strongest partifans of the revolution against France, against the peace, against the queen herfelf, and against her ministers, who they confidered as the open betravers of their country to her greateft enemy, and as harbouring defigns directly fubverfive of the conflitution, could not but operate greatly to the rejection of this treaty, independently of its real merits or faults.

Without attempting at this time to enter into any particular difcuffion of thole which may be difcovered in the prefent, we fhall only observe in general, that an apparent fairnes, a defire to bury ancient animolities, to cure national prejudices, and to remove the partialities incident to jarring interests, feem feem to pervade the whole, and to have been the leading objects of the parties. Reciprocity is the grand principle of the treaty; and it feems to have been intended on both fides, that no concession should be made on either, which was not balanced by a fuppoled equivalent on the other. It is fearcely within the verge of poffibility, that men fhould not differ in their estimate of these equivalents. A vast reduction was made on the duties laid on the wines, brandies, and vinegars of France, upon their importation into England; oil, and fome other staple commodities, were to be admitted upon the fame footing with those of the most favoured nations. Similar conceffions were ma e by France, with respect to the hardware, and other great manufactures of Eugland : reciprocality, and a free and eafy intercourle between the parties, being the ground-work of all these arrangements.

What is more particularly interefting to humanity in general than mere commercial regulations, which always look to interest as their object, is, that France has upon this occafion freely facrificed her ancient civil and religious prejudices, which feemed fo closely interwoven in her nature and conflitution as to appear almost infeparable. She allows the English residing in her dominions the most perfect liberty in religious matters; instead of being compellable to attend the public fervice or worship of the country, they are authorized in the full exercise of their own religious rites, only fubject to the reasonable condition of their being performed privately, and within their own houfes. The shameful, odious, and inhuman practice, of refuting the rites of fepulture to the bolies of supposed hereticks, is likewife done away by this treaty. Several other wife and humane regulations, tending to the eafe, advantage, and fecurity of individuals, and to the promoting of the most free and friendly intercourfe and connection between the nations, are alfo contained in it. Though thefe were apparently mutual and reciprocal, yet their benefits refted almost entirely with the English : the free laws and government of that people, with the equal and liberal courfe of their juffice, not admitting of those restrictions to the perfons or property of foreigners, to which they had been themselves fubjected in France. Thus the property of British subjects who die in France is now fecured to their heirs, without lett or moleftation, directly contrary to former ulage. Upon the breaking out of a war between the two nations, it was cuftomary for the English in France to be obliged to quit the country at a very fhort notice, and frequently to the great detriment of their affairs; but now they are permitted to refide in it, and to purfue their refpective avocations with the fame freedom as at home, under the fimple and equitable condition of conforming to its laws. It was likewife cuffornary to commit them to the Bastile, upon even slight fuspicions of their public conduct; but now, in that cale, they are allowed twelve months to remove their perfons and property out of the kingdom. It was hitherto the cuffom that they could not quit Paris without a licence from government; they are now to have the fame liberty of free egress and regress through through and from every part of the kingdom that they could enjoy in their own country. The examination of letters, and other difficulties attending a correspondence in France, were a great grievance not only to merchants, whole private and molt fecret affairs were thus exposed, but to literary men, and even to common friends. This evil is now removed, and the most perfect fecurity afforded, particularly to merchants, who are admitted to carry on their correspondence in any language or idiom they shall think proper, without any moleftation or learch whatfoever.

We shall referve any farther obfervations on this treaty to another feason, when its discussion will appear in the proper place.

France through the course of this year, paid the most marked attentention, to every department of her marine, and to the promotion of every part of her commerce both foreign and domessic. With a view to future wars, she likewise endeavoured to increase the number of her naval arsenals and ports on the ocean (in which she is by nature so defective), for the reception of ships of the line, and the flation of warlike fleets.

The port of Cherburgh, on the coaft of Normandy, from its vicinity to England, and lying directly oppolite to the coaft of Hamphire, feemed directly calculated for this purpole; and undoubtedly, if its natural defects could be remedied by art, it would prove a moft advantageous flation, to the French fleets in a war with England, and could not fail to become au exceedingly, painful and dangerous thorn in the fide of that power. The fcheme was accordingly adopted with great fpirit, and carried on at an immenfe expense. For the load being about a league and a half in length from east to weft, notwithflanding the cover in part of a low ifland, which confiderably ferves to break the violence of the waves, is ftill much exposed to the north and north-weft winds; to remedy which it was proposed to cover the road entirely by a faceoffion of moles on that fide, leaving only two fufficient openings, one for the paffage of Thips of the largest fize, and the other for trading vefiels. One of thefe moles was to be carried through the ifland (which was mostly overflown in fpring tides) and the others were to have their foundations laid, and superstructure raifed, in a deep and boifterous fea. The labour was vaft, but the object was highly inviting; for if the fences could be compleated, large fleets, composed of the most capital ships, might lie fecurely at anchor within them in all weather. Forts, with batteries of the heaviest cannon, were to be erected on the different moles in fuch fituations as to be themfelves impregnable, and to render the approach of an enemy utterly impracticable. A capacious bafon, with docks, and all the other appendages to a great naval arienal, were to be constructed in and adjoining to the harbour and town. The number of hands employed in this mighty defign were fuited w its magnitude and importance ; and the removal and placing, by any number, of those immonite maile of folid rock, which, in fo turbulent a fea, could alone kay the foundations of fuch flupendous piles of building, would have appeared impeflible to any any, who had not before feen or heard of fimilar grand exertions of human labour and art.

This Herculean labour was deemed of fuch national importance, that the king, who had never before been at any confiderable diftance from Paris, took a journey on purpofe to behold its progrefs. Even now, as it might be faid in its infant state, he could not behold without furprize the stupendous parts of that future giant which were already in prospect. The supporters of the mole were to be in the form of cones, and were of fo prodigious a bulk, that the timber caffoons in which they were enclosed were fixty French fathoms in diameter at the bottom. One of thefe was fuc-June 22d, cefsfully launched in the 1786. king's prefence, an event which perhaps fcarcely afforded greater joy to the architect, than fatisfaction to the monarch, who did not endeavour to conceal his aftonifhment at this incredible exertion of human power.

While the king was at this place he was feized with a firong defire of feeing those ancient domains of the dukedom of Normandy, the iflands of Jersey and Guernsey; and actually embarked in a frigate, with a view of visiting the former; but a fudden squall arising when he was about half way over, fome of the nobility in his train disfuaded him from proceeding any farther.

Religious prejudices are happily wearing faft away in France, and without fome extraordinary and unfortunate intervention, it may be hoped that it will not require a very long fucceffion of years for their entire exhaufture. Inftead of the crown iffuing perfecuting edicts against its own subjects, as formerly, on that account, this year has been fignalized by an arret, inviting strangers of all christian nations and religious persuasions whatever to fettle in the country, enabling them to purchase lands, and to enjoy all the common rights of citizens.

It afforded a fingular object of moral and political confideration, to behold fourteen veffels from North America arrive together in the harbour of Dunkirk, freighted with the families, goods, and property of a colony of quakers and baptifts, (the most rigid, perhaps, in their religious principles of any among the reformed) who are come to fettle at that place, in a Roman catholic country, and under the government of the French monarch; two circumfances the most directly oppofite to their ancient fentiments, whether political or religious. Thefe people amounted to about a hundred families, and are defined to the profecution of the whale and other fifheries, in which they had long been fuperiorly eminent at home. Μ. de Calonne had the honour of forming the fcheme, of inviting them, and of giving them every encouragement they could defire; particularly in every possible security for the prefervation of their civil rights and religious freedom. The ruin which befel the American oil trade, and confequently fisheries, through their unhappy separation from England, afforded the occasion on one fide, and laid the necessity on the other.

Another arret was iffued about the fame time as the former, for the encouragement of artifts and manufacturers of all nations to fettle in France, by allowing them the fame privileges privileges which they enjoyed in their native countries, with exemptions from all duties, for a limited time, on the importation of the raw materials uied in their manufactures, as well as from the payment of taxes, and all perfonal duties to themfelves and their workmen ; on these conditions they were bound to continue for a given number of years in the kingdom, and for the greater fecurity were not to form their fettlements within feven leagues of the frontier; but at the expiration of the prefcribed term they were to be at full liberty to depart, when, and in whatever manner was most convenient to them, and to remove their property as well as their perfons wherever they fhould think proper; the king giving up the droit d'aubaine entirely in their favour.

It would have been a firange folecifm in policy to encourage and allure foreign protestants to settle in the kingdom, without reftoring the numerous natives of that profeffion in fome confiderable degree to the rights of citizens. Indeed the king and the government feem to hold difpositions very favourable to the granting of every indulgence to the native protestants, which they could well with propriety expect. But there are great and numerous difficulties in the way to their full establishment in all those rights, which they would have poffeffed if they had adhered to the public religion of their country. The clergy in France are a very great and powerful body, and befides their ufual influence upon the people, are fo interwoven with the nobility, as not, in the prefent order of things, to be feparable. Such an union mult be treated with great tendernefs and caution by the crown, even in France.

The Gallican church, by ever keeping itfelf distinct, and nobly fupporting its rights against the encroachments of the fee of Rome, has thereby acquired a degree of weight, dignity, and character, which no other of the fame perfuation pof-The parith priefts likewife feiles. in France have long been celebrated for general humanity and benevolence, care of, and tendernefs to, their flocks, irreproachable lives, and the general excellency of their character. All these concurrent circumftances ferve to give fuch a firmners to the whole establishment, that it could not without great difficulty be thaken.

Indeed it never will be found eafy to draw fo ftrait and equal a line between the public religious effablishment of any country, and that which is only tolerated, as can afford full fatisfaction to both the The one will ever regard parties. whatever is granted either as an encroachment on, or as endangering its own rights, while the other is apt, on every new indulgence or favour, to grow the more impatient for greater, and even to long for the forbidden fruits of church emolument, in proportion as they become nearer in view.

Something was, however, done in favour of the native proteftants in France, though probably not fomuch as was withed, or even intended. The legitimacy of their marriages is to be admitted, and the rights of inheritance confequently eftablished, under the condition of the former being registered in an office appointed for the purpose at the Hotel de Ville. They are likewise to be admitted admitted to inflitute places of public worthip, but they muft bear only the outward appearance of private houfes; in these they will be entitled to the free exercise of their religious rites, fubject to the fingle restriction of keeping the doors shut during the fervice. Their pastors are of courfe exonerated from all the penalties preferibed by former laws.

Thus has fome confiderable opening been made towards affording relief to fo numerous a body of the people, who after all the loffes they had fuftained by wars, emigrations, and punifhments, and the long and continued opprefions they have endured, fill amount to a fifth or fixth of the whole inhabitants of the kingdom, the loweft climates rating their numbers at four millions.

Some indulgences have been extended to the peafantry this year in . France; that most valuable order of men, who are the foundation of ftrength, wealth, and power in every community that possessions them, and who have been too long moft fhamefully and unwifely defpifed and oppressed, not only in France, but in most other countries. They are now relieved from that intolerable bondage and continued opprefion to which they had fo long been fubjected, under the arbitrary domination of inferior mercenary officers, with refpect to the heavy labour to which they were bound in the repair and construction of the roads; these petty ministers of the civil power, either grinding them by the most shameles extortion of money, which their poverty could fo ill fpare, or tyranically compelling them to attend with their carts and draught cattle to the duty of the roads, at the moft diffresting and critical feafons of their agriculture. A new fystem is adopted with respect to the roads; the farmers are to be discharged from the duty, and the work to be done by labourers hired at the public expence.

An edict was likewife paffed this year which affords a fecurity that was greatly wanting to the community in general, but more particularly to the trading and manufacturing part, with respect both to their perfons and property. Many cities and corporations poffelled the municipal authority of arrefting the perfons and detaining the property of ftrangers who came transiently within their jurifdiction, for real or pretended charges of debt laid against them by persons at any diftance, and fometimes in the remoteft provinces. The most doubtful documents were received as fufficient grounds for these actions; and the general neceffary confequence was, that the defendant, if far from home, and no powerful connection within reach, was totally ruined, at the fuit perhaps of an unknown and unheard of plaintiff, before he could find means to extricate his perfon or property. The enormity was fo glaring, that its existence for any length of time would appear almost incredible, if fimilar inftances of the long fufferance of evil, through the fupineness of rulers, and the defect of spirit or power in the injured, had not been observable in all countries : it is now, however, abolifhed, and this crying grievance effectually redreffed.

If it may not be confidered as a revolution in the hiftory of mankind, it may however be admitted as a fingular ingular and unexampled inflance of change in the fentiments of the weftern world, that the royal academy of fciences at Paris this year elected, as one of their foreign correfpondents, a Mr. Liftel, a Free Black, of the ifle of France, who had diftinguifhed himfelf by a feries of curious and extremely well-calculated meteorological obfervations; thus breaking down in fome degree the firong and long-eftablished line of diffinction between colours, and holding out encouragement to future Africans to cultivate the fciences and philosophy, by shewing them that the way is opened to academical honours, wherever they are merited, without any regard to the country or natural hue of the ingenious proficient.

Naples. On the morning of the 12th of November laft, at leaft one hundred fhocks of an earthquake were felt in the environs of Vefuvius. This mountain, which has been for fome time in convultions, continues to vomit forth a prodigious quantity of inflammable matter, which terrifies the inhabitants, left the lava fhould take a new courfe, and overflow the country.

The Swallow packet, from 11th. Bengal, arrived in the Downs, on the 9th inflant, on board of which lord Macartney came paffenger. His lordthip was feveral days in Calcutta, previous to the arrival of the difpatches of the Court of Directors containing his appointment of governor-general of Bengal. This packet brought over a copy of the fentence of the court-martial on major-general fir John Burgoyne, bart. which honourably acquits him of every part of the charge against him.

16. The feffions at the Old Bai-Vol. XXVIII. ley, which began upon Wednefday the 11th, ended, when 7 convicts received ientence of death, 20 were fentenced to be transported, 14 to be imprisened, and kept to hard labour in the house of correction, 6 to be whipped, 2 imprisend in Newgate, and 16 discharged by proclamation.

At the above feffions, among others, came on the trial of John Hogan, a Mulatto, for the murder of the fervant of Mr. Orrell, of Charlotte-ftreet. The following circumstances appeared-That the deceafed had her head-drefs torn off, and thrown on the ground, covered with blood, as were her handkerchief, gown, &c. Her fkull was fractured; her left eye beaten almost out of its socket; her cheekbones both broken; her chin cut; her neck and throat both cut; feveral wounds in her break, particularly a large circular one; her left arm broke; and her right arm and wrift both cut. The inftrument with which the wounds had been made was a razor; and notwithftanding it had been thrown into a fire, the fpots of blood were not erafed.

She was alive, but fpeechlefs, and died the fame night at twelve o'clock. The prifoner having brought home fome chairs, a fhort time before, to Mr. Orrell's, and a [N] perfon perfon anfwering his defcription having been feeu in the neighbourhood that day, fuspicion fell on him, and he was twice taken up, and twice difcharged for want of evidence.

The prifoner had been tried for a larceny, and Mr. Orrell reading his trial in the feffions-paper, it occurred to him to fearch at the pawabroker's, where he had pawned the property flolen, for which he was to tried, to fee if any of his property, which was flolen at the time of the murder, had been lodged with that pawnbroker; there he found a cloak of his wife's, pawned the morning after the murder, by the woman with whom he cohabited.

On the prifoner's being taken to the body of the deceafed, he appeared not in the least agitated; but, putting his hand on her breaft, he faid, " My dear Nancy, I do " remember you well; Inever did " you any harm in my life!"---Thefe expressions very forcibly added to the sufpicions of his guilt, becaule her face was fo exceedingly cut and mangled, that Mr. Orrell declared he could not poffibly have Two other circumftanknown her. ces, which tended to criminate him, were a fpot of blood on a waiftcoat which he wore, and fome flight marks of blood on one of the fleeves of his coat; which coat had been wafhed, though the blood on the fleeve remained; and an effort feemed to have been made, but in vain, to rub out the fpot of blood from the waiftcoat.

The principal evidence against him was the woman with whom he cohabited; who deposed, that he brought her home a cloak, which he faid he had bought, on condition of paying for it at the rate of fo much a week. The cloak was produced in court, and Mrs. Orrell fwore to it as her property. The deponent further faid, that after Hogan had been twice taken before a magistrate, he, at intervals, appeared to be very uneafy; that particularly he could not fleep in bed; that the faid to him one night, " For "God's fake what is the matter " with you? furely you are not " guilty of what you have been ta-" hen up for :" that his answer v.as, "Yes, I am :- I am guilty :---" I did it."-She then was much troubled in mind, and apprehended fatal confequences to herfelf, particularly, as he faid to her, "You muft fay nothing ; you muft be quiet, for if I be hanged, you will be hanged with me :" and on her afking him, why he had murdered the young woman, he answered, because he wanted to be great with her, and the refifted him.

The prifoner being called on for his defence, faid, "I am innocent; " and if any body takes away my " Hife, I will never forgive them."

The recorder fummed up the trial with great impartiality, and the jury inftantly found him guilty; he was then fentenced to be executed on Monday morning, and his body to be diffected and anatomized. He was accordingly taken from Newgate in a cart on Monday, and executed on a gibbet opposite Mr. Orrell's house. A great concourse of people attended the execution, but never died a malefactor with lefs pity. Juft before being turned off, he bowed four times to the populace, and, in an audible voice, confessed himfelf guilty of the murder, for which he had been justly condemned to die.

This morning Mr. Price, 25th. who was committed on fufpicion of forgery on the bank, and was to have been examined as this day at eleven, hanged himfelf in his room in Tothill-fields bridewell. From a variety of circumftances, there remains no doubt but that he is the perfon fo frequently advertifed for forgeries on the bank for feveral years paft, and who has had the addrefs to elude the strictest fearch, though long known and fuspected. It was his cuftom, at times, to give entertainments to a felect party, and, to evade the plate-tax, to borrow the fplendid articles of the fideboard at a pawn-broker's, depofiting bank-notes as a fecurity. The pawn-broker happening to offer one at the bank, was stopped, and, on relating how he came by it, with all the circumstances, proper people were fent to the fhop, who, when he came to return the plate, immediately took him into cuftody.

fhocking murders ever committed. A difference had for fome time fubfifted between G.R. Fitzgerald an 1 Patrick Randal M'Donald, Efgrs. Mr. M'Donald kept much on his guard, as he received many informations, that feveral parties of Fitzgerald's men were looking out for him, with an avowed determination to deftroy him. In the evening of the 20th of Feb. last Mr. M. Donald went for the greater fecurity to the house of Mr. Martin, in the neighbourhood of Cafflebar, in company with Mr. Gallagher and another geatleman. They had been there but a very few minutes, when the house was furrounded by a large party of armed men, who inftantly broke in, bound Mr. M'Donald, Mr. Gallagher, and the other gentleman, and immediately carried them off to the house of Rockfield, where Fitzgerald as it is faid then was. After a fhort flay an armed party led out the unfortunate gentlemen into the park. In a few feconds a platoon was fired, and laid one of the devoted victims dead on the fpot. Mr. M'Donald and Mr. Gallagher were ordered to go about 50 yards farther, when a fecond platoon was fired. Mr. M'Donald initantly fell dead, upwards of 50 flugs paffing into his body. Mr. Gallagher received alfo feveral flugs, but, as Providence would have it, he was not mortally wounded. However, he thought it prudent, after staggering a few yards, to fall and appear motionlefs, in order to deceive the murderers. In this wounded state they brought him back to Fitzgerald's house, where they had returned but a few minutes, when the houfe was furrounded by the army from Caitlebar, many of the volunteers, gentlemen, and crowds of people from that town and neighbourhood. They fpeedily got into the houfe, delivered Mr. Gallagher in a moft critical moment, feized feveral of the murderers, and after a very firit and long fearch found Fitzgeraid locked up in a large cheft, and hid under two blankets. He and feveral of his people were immediately conducted to Cathebar, and fafely lodged in the gaol, which has been continually guarded both by the army and volunteers, to prevent any poffibility of an efcape.

At Godftone, in Surrey, a murder was lately committed, attended with circumitances of the most vindictive barbarity. An impostor, under pretence of being a cripple, had long been a charge upon the parifh; but being detected by Mr. Eurt, a furgcon of that town, the villain vowed revenge; and, on the 13th inflant, feized the opportunity to put his diabolical purpofe in execution. He had on that day, as usual, taken his fland upon the road to beg alms, fupported by crutches; and, on Mr. Burt's passing from his own house to the poor-house, accompanied by his fon, a lad about ten years of age, after exclaiming, " There goes " that rafcal Burt," he threw a bill at his legs, which fortunately miffed them, and then purfuing, and prefently overtaking him, by a blow from his crutch brought him to the ground; this was followed by a repetition of blows upon the head with his hand-bill, till he actually buried the bill in Mr. Burt's fkull. Mr.  $[N]._{4}$ Burt's Burt's hand was fevered from the arm in endeavouring to fave his head, and a thumb was afterwards found at some distance, which had been chopt . ff, and had fprung from the hand by the force with which the blows had been directed. At this horrible moment, the little boy, feizing the murderer's crutch, ftruck him fuch a blow as to flagger him; but, fearing his father's fate, ran to call affiftance; and in the mean while the villain made off; but was foon after found hid in a copfe. Ou his being feized, he lamented that the overfcers had efcaped his vengeance. Had he done for them, he fhould have died contented. What he was not able to effect, his wife has threatened to perpetrate, if her hufband is hurt.

By ten o'clock the aile and galleries were filled with a company the most numerous and elegant that ever were affembled on a fimilar occasion, which, with the prefence of the Royal Family and their attendants, and an orcheftra confifting of 640 mulicians, formed a coup d'ail, the effect of which it is impossible to defcribe. The difposition of the church was most beautifully conceived in the manner of a grand faloon, with two rifing galleries. The nave of the church contained the platform, and the two ailes formed one gallery, which was continued in one range under the king's box to either fide. The fronts were hung in feftoons with rich crimfon filk furniture. That part which forms the front was variegated with white fattin. The difpolition of the king's box was the fame as laft year.

A duel was fought near 8th. Kenfington, between Lord Macartney and Major-general Stuart, of which the following is an authentic account :

" The place and time of meeting having been previoufly fixed. the parties arrived about half paft four o'clock in the morning, and took their ground at the diffance of twelve fhort paces, meafured off by the feconds, who delivered to each one pittol, keeping pofferfion of the remaining arms. General Stuart told Lord Macartney, he doubted, as his lordfhip was fhort-fighted, he would not be able to fee him; his lordship replied, " he did, perfectly well." When the feconds had retired a little on one fide, and as the parties were about to level, General Stuart observed to Lord Macartney, that his piftol was not cocked; his lordfhip thanked him, and cocked. When they had levelled, Gencral Stuart faid, he was ready; his lordfhip anfwered, he was likewife ready; and they both fired within a few inftants of each other. The feconds, obferving Lord Macartney wounded, flepped up to him, and declared the matter mult rest here: General Stuart said. " this is no fatisfaction ;" and afked if his lordthip was not able to fire another piftol; his lordship replied, " he would try with pleafure," and urged Colonel Fullarton to permit him to proceed. The feconds, how ever, declared it was impossible. 2 and

and they would on no account allow it. General Stuart faid, " Then I muft defer it till another occasion !" on which his Lordfhip answered, " If that is the cafe, we had better proceed now. I am here in confequence of a meffage from General Stuart, who called upon me to give him fatisfaction in my private capacity for offence taken at my publie conduct; and, to evince that perfonal fafety is no confideration with me, I have nothing perfonal: the general may proceed as he thinks fit." General Stuart faid, " It was his lordship's perfonal conduct to him that he refented." The feconds then put an end to all further conversation between the parties, neither of whom had quitted their ground; General Stuart, in confequence of his fituation, having been under the necessity from the first of putting his back to a tree.

The furgeons, Mr. Hunter and Mr. Home, and who were attending at a little diffance, were brought up by Colonel Fullarton. Colonel Gordon, in the mean time, affifted his lordfhip in taking off his coat, and requefted him to fit down, apprehending hemight be faint through lofs of blood. Colonel Gordon then left the ground, in company with General Stuart; and an eafy carriage was provided to convey his lordfhip home.

Signed, W. FULLARTON, A. GORDON."

19th. Came on to be tried before Lord Loughborough, in the court of Common Pleas, the action brought by the right honourable Charles James Fox, againft Thomas Corbett, Efq. high bailiff of Weftminfter, for not returning him as a reprefentative for Weftminfter, when duly elected by a legal majority of votes ; the damages were laid at 100,000l. and the jury, after a few minutes confultation, gave a verdict of 2000l. damages.

This fum, Mr. Fox has declared, fhall be diftributed among the charities of Weftminfter.

On the 21st of June the sentence on Madame de la Motte was carried into execution. At a quarter after fix in the morning, one of the turnkeys of the prifon went up to her fleeping apartment, and, without any apology for disturbing her at that early hour, told her, in a brutal manner, to " rife and follow him." The affrighted lady refused to obey; but when fhe was fhewn a royal mandate, fhe, though reluctantly, followed the turnkey, and was by him conducted to the inner gate. She no fooner defcended the laft ftep of the stairs, than she was feized on by two fatellites of the law, by them hand-cuffed, and inexorably embraced. When the countefs appeared before the Greffier, and her fentence was read to her, it threw her into the most frantic rage; she uttered calumnious and unheard-of imprecations against the court, the parliament, and the cardinal; but this fame great spirit deferted her when the felt the hangman putting the rope about her neck; fhe was at that inftant feen in tears. The inftruments for her further punishment, the brand, fome other tools, and a red-hot fire, called up all her former rage: fhe then curfed and fwore in the most unwoman-like manner, and uttered alternate cries of grief and defpair. It was with difficulty that the hot iron could be applied to her fhoulder; the executioner must have been an adept, to have fucceeded in that part of his profession. She rolled herfelf on on the ground, and kicked at him with fuch violence, that fome frength was required to perform the ignominious operation. The very inflant the execution was over, fhe was conducted to the Salpetrierre, where fhe is defined to fpend the remainder of her days. All Paris is incenfed at the barbarous conduct of the magistrates who presided at the execution of Madame de la Motte; their inhumanity reflects the greatest dishonour on them. The unhappy comtesse was burnt in three places, through the inattention of these guardians of our laws ! She is now dangeroufly ill in the infirmary of the Salpetrierre; a burning fever deprives her of her reason; and in the height of her delirium fhe utters the most outof-the-way imprecations. The fuperior of the houfe treats her with all poffible humanity.

A very interefting caufe 30th. was determined in the cockpit, by an appeal to the lords of the council from the court of admiralty. The queftion related to the prize, or capture, made by Commodore Johnstone last war. It was, Whether the capture was prize or booty; and then, confequently, whether the property then taken by the fleet and land forces under his command came within the prize act. As the deflination of the armament was against the Cape of Good Hope, and as a confiderable land force, under the command of General Meadows, was aboard, and fhared in the action, their lordships determined that the cafe in question did not come within the prize act. The confequence is, that the whole property is claimed by the crown, and the captors must relinquish their hopes of prize-money, and depend on the royal bounty for whatever compensation his majefty may think proper.

DIED. Lately, at Woolwich, aged 105, Ifabella Dryden. She had been twice in America fince fhe was 85 years of age, and retained her fenfes to the day of her death.

JULY.

An action of trefpafs was 1ft. lately tried in the court of King's Bench, by which the right of following hounds in purfuit of game, by qualified perions, was clearly afcertained.

Came on before the lords commiffioners of appeals, two 5th. caufes againft Lord Rodney, General Vaughan, and the other captors of Euflatia.— Mr. Lindo and Mr. Ingram, appellants—the firit to the amount of about 12,0001. the latter 10001. Upon both thefe appeals the captors were caft in damages, and full cofts. The lords who attended were Camden, Grantley, and Mulgrave.

Aylett's (the attorney convisited for perjury) writ of erfor was folemnly argued before the Houfe of Lords. There were thine affignments of error, all which their lordfhips were pleafed to fet afide by the unanimous opinion of the judges prefent. Earl Bathurit then moved, 206] moved, That the judgment be affirmed. Agreed.

Berlin, June 3. The king has passed fentence upon a counsellor of the regency, which makes a great fir here. Mr. Glave, counfellor at Konigfberg, being accufed of corruption, his majefty charged the prefident of the chamber of that place to make the necessary judicial enquiries into the affair, and the delinquent was condemned to two years imprilonment in a fortrefs; the counfellor, not fatisfied with the decifion, made another appeal; the king, after a mature examination, not only confirmed the above fentence, but ordered that the delinquent fhould work at the barrow during the two years of his imprifonment.

Vienna, June 12. The emperor has suppressed the chapters of Wigthrengen and Trelergen, in Carinthia; and those of Lambrecht, Neuberg, Stanz, Croatman, and Pallau, in Styria. The convents of capuchins, recollets, and dominicans, are also abolished.

Oxford, July 29. At our affizes came on to be tried before Mr Baron Eyre, a caufe of great importance to the public in general, on a queftion, Whether a farmer who occafionally dealt in horfes was fubject to the bankrupt laws, as a trader ? It was an action of trover, brought on the affignees of John Davis, a farmer of Whitchurch, in zhis county, againft Mr. John Sherwood, of Purley, in the county of Berks, to recover back 2491. 18 s. which he had received under an execution levied on the bankrupt's effects; when the jury, after an hour's confultation, brought in a verdict for the plaintiffs, whereby they established the trading, and gave the above fum in damages, together with full coffs of fuit.

Gottingen, July 25. The three youngest princes of Great Britain were entered of this univerfity on the 6th of this month, each of them accompanied by a governor, a preceptor, and a gentleman; their roval highneffes are lodged in one house, and the expences of their table fixed at 600 crowns per week, including two grand inflitution dinners, to which the professions and fome students are invited. Profeffor Mayer teaches the princes the German language ; Mr. Heyne inftructs them in Laun; the ecclefiaftic counfellor Lefs teaches them religion; and the counfellor Feder inftructs them in morality; thefe mafters are rewarded by an extraordinary appointment of 1000 crowns per annum each.

The feffions at the Old 26th. Bailey, which began on the 19th, ended, when twelve convicts received featence of death; among whom was Samuel Burt, for forgery. This man, when he was afked, what he had to fay why judgment to die should not be passed, according to law? addreffed the court as follows : " My lord, I am too fenfible of the crime which I have committed, and for which I juftly deferve to fuffer; my life I have forfeited, and with to relign it into the hands of Him who gave it me. To give my reafons for this, would only fatisfy an idle curiofity; no one can feel a more fenfible, heartfelt fatisfaction in the hopes of shortly paffing into eternity; wherein, I truft, I shall meet with great felicity. I have not the least defire to live ; and, as the jury and the court on my trial thought proper to recommend me to mercy, if his majelty jefty should, in confequence thereof, grant me a refpite, I here vow, in the face of Heaven, that I will put an end to my own existence as foon as I can. It is death that I wish for, because nothing but death can extricate me from the troubles which my follies have involved me in."

DIED. Lately, at Paris, of an apoplexy, in his 114th year, Joseph Buller, a native of Savoy. He ferved feveral years under Prince Eugene, and had worked near 60 years on the quays at Paris. The only illnefs he ever experienced was a diftemper in his eyes, occasioned by a fall from a pile of wood when about 50 years of age. He had lived 57 years with one wife, and renewed his marriage at St. Etrenne du Mont. He followed his bufinefs to the age of 105, and would not then have left it off, had not the charitable contributions raifed for him enabled him to fubfift without it. A print of him was published fome years ago, at the bottom of which it is faid, that his father died aged 123 years 10 months.

Kelfo, Aug. 11. About two this morning a flock of an earthquake was felt here; its motion was from work to east. The motion was fucceeded by a noife as if the tiles had been tumbling from the roof.

Cockermouth, Aug. 11. About five minutes before two this morning we had a fmart fhock of an earthquake, which continued three or four feconds, attended with a noife as if a well-packed hogfhead had been thrown with violence on a boarded floor. The ftrings of a fpinnet were heard to vibrate; others thought thieves had broken in.

Whitebawen, Aug. 11. A few minutes before two this morning the flock of an earthquake was very fenfibly felt in this town and neighbourhood; its continuance from three to five feconds. The barometer at twenty-nine degrees, the weather clofe and fultry. Its direction supposed from fouth to east, accompanied with a rumbling noife in the air. There was not sufficient light to make farther obfervations : the confernation it caufed was inexpreffible. A chimney was thrown down in Tangren-street; three people, in different parts of the town, were were thrown off their feet, and one confiderably hurt.

His majestv, the queen, 16th. and their royal highnefies the princefs royal, princefs Augusta, and princels Elizabeth, fet out from Earl Harcourt's feat at Nuneham Court, after divine fervice on Sunday morning last, and arrived at the Eastern gate of the public schools at Oxford foon after one o'clock. Their majefties from thence proceeded to vifit the chapel at New College, the colleges of Wadham, Trinity, Lincoln, and Brazen Nofe. Their majefties and the princeffes fet out again from Nuneham between nine and ten o'clock on Monday morning, and arrived at Blenheim between eleven and twelve, having been met, and attended thither, by the inhabitants of Woodflock. Their majefties were received at Blenheim by the duke and duchefs of Marlborough, with every mark of attention and refpect. After having viewed the houfe, and as much of the park as the time would admit of, they returned to Nuneham about eight o'clock.

On Tuefday morning, at Nuneham, his majefty was pleafed to confer the honour of knighthood on Charles Nourfe, efq. of Oxford; and an addrefs was there prefented to the king from the gentlemen, clergy, and other inhabitants of the town of Witney, and its neighbourhood, which his majefty was pleafed to receive very gracioufly.

SEPTEMBER.

Oxford, Sept. 16. On Tuefday evening arrived here the archduke and archduchefs of Auftria, under the titles of count and countefs of Nellembourg; prince Charles Albani, first coufin to the archduchefs; and his confort; prince Rezzenico, senator of Rome; count Soderini, the Venetian refident, prince Lichtenstein; and count Rezvieski, the Imperial ambaffador. Thefe illustrious visitors, with their suite, were next morning conducted to feveral of the public buildings and colleges; and on Wedneiday went to Blenheim, the feat of the duke On Thurfday of Marlborough. they made the tour of Stowe, the feat of the marquis of Buckingham; and yefterday morning fet out for Nuneham, the feat of the earl earl of Harcourt. Returning about one o'clock, their royal highnefies vifited the reft of the colleges, obfervatory, &c.

18th. In compliment to the arch-18th. duke of Auftria, his majefly this day commenced the hunting fport on Windfor-foreft. He was accompanied by his highnefs during the chace.

The royal obsequies of the late king of Pruflia were performed on the 9th instant, with the greatest pomp. The affluent display on this occafion was truly aftonishing. The church was hung in all parts with paintings representing, 1st, the conqueft of Silefia. 2dly, The war fuftained by his late majefty against fix fovereigns, from 1756 to 1763. 3dly, The embellishments of the towns, and the cultivation of wafte lands throughout the Pruffian do. minions. 4thly, The taking poffession of Western Prussia. 5thly, The late German confederacy .---6thly, The protection granted during the late reign to the arts and fciences. Six trophies were also erected within the church, on which were infcribed the names of the twelve principal battles during the life of Frederic II. viz, Mollwitz, Czaflau, Sorr, Hohenfriedberg, Keffelsdorff, Lowozits, Prague, Rofbach, Leuther, Zorndorff, Leignitz, and Torgau. The whole ceremony did not last above two hours, after which a dinner of 600 covers was ferved in different apartments. On rifing from table, his majefty retired to Sans Souci, and in the evening to Charlottenburgh. The chamberlains, General Rohdich and Vander Reck, who had the direction of the funeral pomp, were each prefented by the king with an elegant VOL. XXVIII.

On Monday, October 2, the new monarch received the homage of his fubjects at Berlin. This ceremony is obferved in Pruffia instead of a coronation, and is no lefs magnificent.

Newcastle upon Tyne, Sept. 20. Lunardi's attempt to alcend yefterday from the Spital ground was productive of a very melancholy accident. The balloon was about one-third full, and a great many gentlemen were holding it by the netting, when Lunardi went to pour into the ciftern the reft of the oil of vitriol defined for the purpofe. This having caufed a flrong effervescence, generated inflammable air with fuch rapidity, that fome of it escaped from two different parts of the lower end of the apparatus, and ipread among the feet of feveral gentlemen who were holding the balloon, and who were fo alarmed, that leaving it at liberty, they ran from the fpot. The balloon now rofe with great velocity, carrying up with it Mr. Ralph Heron, a gentleman of this town, about twenty-two years of age, fon of Mr. Heron, under-sherisf of Northumberland.

This unhappy vicitim held a firong rope which was faftened to the crown of the balloon, twifted about his hand, and could not difengage himfelf when the other gentlemen fled; he was of courfe elevated about the height of St. l'aul's cupola, when the balloon turned downward, the crown divided from it, and the unfortunate gentleman feil to the ground.

He did not expire immediately, having fallen upon very foft ground; he fpoke for some time to his un-[0] happy 210] happy parents, and to the furgeons who came to affift him; but his internal veffels being broken, he died about an hour and an half after the fall.

The Lady Catherine Boc-18th. Cabad iti, wite of the Marquis Senator Albergati Capacelli, agod 38 years, ended her life at Bologna in the most tragical manner. Having had a difpute at dinner, about an object of fmall importance, which fhe defended with fome heat, and being contradicted by her hulband, fhe left the room, taking with her a child of eight years old, with whom the went up flairs, and after tenderly embracing the child, fne took out of a cafe a Venetian dagger, which the inflantly ran into her body. The child immediately crying out, alarmed the family, and the Marquis running up flairs, the enraged lady with redoubled fury, on feeing him, plunged the dagger through her heart ; by which fecond thruft fhe inftantly fell dead at his fcet.

On Wednefday, August the ad, about four in the afternoon, as Cardinal Turlone, High Inquifitor of the Holy Office, was coming from the Vatican, he was fet upon by an incenfed multitude, who forced his eminence out of the carriage, and after cutting off his note and ears, and mangling him in a moft fhocking manner, dragged the butchered carcafe to Monte Tiburno, where they hung it on a gibbet 50 feet high, which they erected for that purpose. The reasons assigned for this popular execution are various; but that, which feems to have wrought most powerfully on the minds of the populace, was the cruelty of his difposition, which ex-cooded even that of Nero; for when, by the rigour with which he had everched the office of inquifitor, hoped miled the gacls throughout the Force dominions with induftrious artificers and ethers, on flight pretences, and a motion was made in the Vatican for an act of grace, infierd of giving that motion his fuffrage, he fent an express order to the feveral gaolers to keep their prifoners double-ironed, left an efcape fhould be attempted. He was originally a Black-friar; but for fome time was a pleader at the bar, and raifed to the purple, to the amazement of the people, by a concatenation of crafty and iniquitous intrigues.

This day Thomas Sainf-29th. bury, Eiq. alderman of Bil-29th. lingfgate Ward, was elected lord mayor of London for the year enfuing.

DIED. Lately, at Paris, M. Beaujon, the rich financier, the king's banker, &c. faid to be worth two millions flerling.

At his houfe in Red-Lionfquare, Jonas Hanway, Efq. 5th. celebrated for his numerous acts of humanity and benevolence.

OCTOBER.

West-Indies. About the beginning of August, a most violent form laid almost waste the fouthern coast of Hispaniola, and had driven out to sea all the shipping from the port of St. Eustatius, and destroyed most of the small craft in that harbour.

And by advices from Guadeloupe a most terrible hurricane destroyed a great part of the plantations on that that island, and three fhips that lay in the harbour were totally loft. This hurricane happened on the 10th of September, and it is feared has done a great deal of damage on other islands.

On Saturday the fecond of September a most alarming hurricane threw the whole island of Barbadoes into the utmost consternation. About eleven at night, when the form was at its height, a ball of fire, of a very terrifying and luminous appearance, was observed in the S. E. isluing from a dark cloud, and fpreading its diverging rays to a vaft circumference, and continuing with unabated splendor near 40 minutes. In the morning of the 3d, Carliflebay exhibited the most shocking picture of defolation that could be conceived, not a vefiel having rode out the florm. And in the country, had the hurricane continued a little longer, it is thought that universal defolation must have ensued. The buildings on many eftates have fuffered, and great damage has been done to the fruits of the earth, plantane-walks, corn, cotton, and canes. The negro-houfes are moftly blown down, and many of their inhabitants killed. In fhort, nothing can be reprefented more deplorable.

Paris, Oct. 3. They write from Befiers, that fome workmen employed in digging a well at Antignac, a village three miles from thence, got to the depth of about fix toifes the third of laft month, when, obferving water to rife, they redoubled their activity, and were prefently aftonifhed by a most violent fubterraneous explosion. Having recovered from their furprize, they again approached the pit, at the bottom of which they perceived one of their comrades, to whom they called, but received no answer. One of his brothers being apprehensive for his fafety, defcended in a bucket, in order to yield him affiftance; but this man fhewed no figns of life after he had reached the bottom. He was followed by a third, who experienced the fame fate. A fourth had the courage to defcend, his companions taking the precaution of faftening a rope to him; and following him with the eye, as he was gently lowered, they foon perceived his head to droop, and his whole frame to be violently agitated. Being immediately drawn up, he continued without motion for two hours .- Recourfe was now had to experiments which ought to have been first adopted. They let down a cock in a bucket, and on being drawn up it was found on the point of expiring, with its feathers burnt. The fame was done with a cat, which was almost dead when drawn up. By means of hooks and other implements the three perfons were raifed out of the pit, being quite lifelefs, and all their fkin appearing to be calcined. The letters farther fay, that the fubterraneous noise still continues, and that chemifts are endeavouring to difcover the caufe of the explosion, and of the vaporous gas, which has proved to fatal in its effects. It is added, that vitrified matter has been taken from the pit, which, it is fupposed, must have been in a state of fution.

About the 15th infl. a perfon who had the appearance of a drover went into York caftle, and told the turnkey he wanted to give a little money among the felons. On being afked how much ? he put his hand in his pocket, and pulled out a handful of filver with fome gold, and gave it the turnkey to be diffributed [O] z among among the most neceffitous. Being asked who had fent it ? he faid it was his own gift. Being further prefied to tell his name, he took his leave as if in haste, and faid, he was going to Northampton. The fame perfon has fince visited feveral other prifons, and given money to poor objects that he has met on the road.

An inhuman murder was lately committed at Lampeter in Cardiganfhire, on a poor woman who by induftry and care had got together a little money, and lived in a little cot by herfelf, which was broke open in the night, her money carried off, and herfelf left a dreadful fpectacle of favage cruelty, being flabbed in feveral parts of her body; her dead corpfe half broiled on a heap of turfs, which it is fuppofed had been fet on fire to burn her cot, and her in it, to prevent fufpicion.

DIED. Lately, in Portugal, in the parish of St. Joannes de Godini, in the diocefe of Oporto, aged 117, Verefimo Nogueira. He ferved as a foldier from the age of 17 till he was 37, and was at the battle of Almanza: after he had obtained his difcharge, he married, had feveral children, and maintained his family by his own labour and fome little independency which he poffessed. He always enjoyed the best state of health, and it is not unlikely that he might have lived fome years longer, had it not been for a fall, in which one of his legs was broken in three places, which occasioned his death. He had all his teeth, and all his hair, a few of which only were grown grey; and he enjoyed all his faculties to the laft. This old man is a proof that an advanced age is not confined to the northern climates.

NOVEMBER.

Came on before lord Mansfield and lord Loughborough, at 4th. Serjeant's Inn-hall, the fecond argument in error brought by Governor Johnstone against Captain Sutton, when Mr. Erskine was heard at full length for the defendant; and Mr. Scott, the governor's counfel, rifing to answer, was told it was quita unneceffary, as nothing had been faid which could induce their lordfhips to alter their opinion, that the judgment obtained by Capt. Sutton in the court of Exchequer fhould be reverfed .- The cafe was fimply this :--- Capt. Sutton obtained a verdict for 5,0001. against Commodore Johnstone. A new trial was granted by the court of Exchequer: a fecond trial had — a fecond verdict for 6.0001. -A motion was then made, grounded on feveral points of law, to arreft judgment. The court confirmed the verdict. The Commodore brings a writ of error on the fame points his motion in arreft of judgment was founded on. This writ of error, by act of parliament, is in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor; but his lordfhip referred the argument to the two chief juffices, who have reverfed the judgment of thecourt of Exchequer.-At prefent, therefore, the matter flands thus : four judges have decided for Capt. Sutton, and two for Commodore Johnstone. The question, it was well known, would eventually go into the house of lords: it remains, therefore, to be known, what the Lord Chancellor and the other judges think on the fubject. The facts of the cafe are totally unaltered and unalterable. The question is reduced to a point of law; but though their lordships reasons are not yet public, public, it is fuppofed to be, whether a common-law action will lie at the fuit of an inferior officer againft a commander in chief, though it be grounded on expre/s malice? The caufe will certainly go to the houfe of lords, being of no lefs importance to the parties, than to the navy of Great Britain.

About two o'clock in the af-10th. ternoon, the Countefs of Strathmore was taken from the house of Mr. Forster in Oxford-street, under pretence of a warrant to take her before lord Mansfield; but in fact to carry her off by a company of armed ruffians. She was forcibly thrust into her own carriage, her own coachman taken from the box, and a ftranger put in his place, who drove off at a most furious rate, and did not stop till he arrived at Barnet, where the carriage was met by a company of armed men: that in passing through one of the turnpikes, the lady was feen to ftruggle much, apparently gagged, and in great diftrefs: but to farther intelligence could then be obtained.

Came on in the court of 11th. King's Bench a trial at bar, in the remarkable caufe between the natural daughter of the late Ch. Mellish, esq. and his niece. The caufe had already been tried, when a verdict was obtained by the daughter, which was fet afide by a fubfequent one in the Common Pleas. The deceased made two wills, one in 1774, which gave place to one in 1780. There was also a codicil in 1781; and the contest was, to which of the wills it applied. The will in 1780 being eftablished by weight of evidences, the codicil of courfe muit refer to that, and fo it was determined.

22d. Yeflerday, Edward Aylette, the attorney, ftood in the pillory in New Palace Yard, Weftminfter, for wilful and corrupt perjury.

This day, juft before the fitting of the court of King's 23d. Bench, Lady Strathmore was brought into Weltminfter-hall; and immediately on the arrival of the Judges, Mr. Law, her counfel, moved, that fhe might be permitted to exhibit articles of the peace againft Mr. Bowes, and feveral others; which being granted, he then moved for an attachment againft Mr. Bowes, and feveral of his accomplices, which was likewife granted.

Mr. Bowes appeared in the 27th. court of King's Bench, when his counfel moved, that he fnould be discharged, on the ground that he had not been legally ferved with the habeas corpus; but the court rejected this motion, confidering the fervice as good. A fimilar motion was likewife made, on the ground tl at Mr. Bowes was actually haftening to town to make a return to the habeas corpus, but was prevented by the attack upon his perfon, and other unavoidable circumstances; but the court confidering this affertion as contradicted by the affidavits of other perfons, rejected this motion alfo; and Mr. Bowes was finally committed to the King's Bench prifon till the judges determine what fecurity he fhall be obliged to find to keep the peace.

DECEMBER.

John Adams, efq. the American plenipotentiary, prefented the Rev. Dr. White, of Pennfylvania, and the Rev. Dr. Provoft, of New York, to the archbithop of Canterbury, to be confectated bi-[0] 3 fhops, fhops for the United States. The Rev. Dr. Griffith, of Virginia, is to be made a third, to complete the government of the epifcopal church in those States.

On Wednefday morning, the oth. St. Austle, Capt. Colmer, from Eaft Loo, was driven on there about a mile to the weftward of Newhaven pier, and dafned to pieces. The captain and crew, four in number, quitted the wreck in time to fave themfelves; but Mr. and Mrs. Giles, a young couple, passengers, who could not be prevailed on to leave the veffel, perifhed. The captain fays, fo averfe was Mr. Giles to leave the wreck, that after he (the captain) had got fafe to land, he lashed himself to a rope, swam again to the wreck, and having boarded her, fastened a rope round Mrs. Giles, for the purpole of having her hauled on fhore; but her hufband immediately caff it off again, and exclaimed, " My dear Bella, don't leave me !" She flaid !- This unfortunate lady was a diffant relation of Lord Courtney's. The failors were treated with the greatest humanity at Newhaven.

A remarkable inftance of prefcience lately happened at Naples : an eminent phyfician in that metropolis one evening called up all his domeflics, and informed them he had provided for them all in his will; after which he took his laft farewel, telling them, that though he felt himfelf in as good a fate of health as he could wift, he was certain that the next morning, precifely at ten o'clock, an apoplectic ftroke would occafion his diffolution, which the event verified in every particular.

19th. The Montego Bay paper. of October 28, mentions a dreadful hurricane at Jamaica, in the night of the 19th, which has done great mischief in many parts of the ifland. In Weftmoreland, in particular, the appearance every where denoted the superior violence of this guft over all that had been experienced fince 1780. The trees, ftripped of their leaves, exhibited an appearance as if fire had devoured their verdure; the shores were covered with duck, teal, and other aquatic birds, that had been driven with irrefiftible impetuofity against the trunks of the mangroves, and dashed to pieces.

Vienna, Nov. 20. An emir of the Turkish empire, efcorted by 12 fpahis (or Turkish horse) has just arrived in this capital from Conftantinople, with prefents of confiderable value and magnificence to his Imperial majefty. Among the prefents are fome fine Greek urns of the ancient fculpture, and a large marble statue of Jupiter Tonans, lately found in digging the ruins of an old temple near Adrianople. To this figure are appended four filver labels, one on each fhoulder, and two on the head; on each the word " Dios" is ftrongly marked, and the other parts of the infeription are now under the invefligation of a prieft of Buda, in Hungary, who is eminently skilled in antiquities. The tenor of this ambaffage from the Ottoman Porte is to effablish a pofitive and specific boundary between the Imperial and the Turkish provinces, particularly on the confines of Hungary, where much difagreement has lately arifen on the building of fome forts by the Emperor's governors on the Ottoman territories. It is, however, certain that affairs will be amicably fettled, and that the agreements between the

the two empires will be fo firmly made, as to render permanent and full advantages to both.

With the effort have arrived four French priefts, who had been captured in a veffet from Marfeilles by a Tunifian xebeck, claimed there by the French conful, and fent from Tunis to Contantinople.

The respectable passengers were : Mifs Eliza Pierce, Mifs Mary Anne Pierce, daughters of the commander; Mils Amy Paul, Mils Mary Paul, daughters of Mr. Paul of Somersetshire, and relations to Capt: Pierce; Mifs Elizabeth Blackburne, daughter of Capt. Blackburne, of the fame fervice; Mifs Mary Haggard, fifter to an officer on the Madras establishment; and Miss Anne Manfell, a native of Madras, but of European parents, returning from receiving her education in England; John George Schutz, efq. returning to Afia, where he had long refided, to collect a part of his fortune which he had left there.

"Monday the 2d of January, at three in the afternoon, a breeze fprung up from the fouth, when they ran in fhore to land the pilot, but very thick weather coming on in the evening, and the wind baffling, at nine in the evening they were obliged to anchor in eighteen fathom water, furled their top-fails, but could not furl their couries, the fnow falling thick, and freezing as it fell.

Tuefday

" Tuefday the 3d, at four in the morning, a ftrong gale came on from east-north-east, and the ship driving, they were obliged to cut their cables, and run off to fea. At noon, they fpoke with a brig bound to Dublin, and having put their pilot on board her, bore down Channel immediately. At eight in the evening, the wind freshening and coming to the fouthward, they reefed fuch fails as were judged neceffary. At ten at night it blew a violent gale of wind at fouth, and they were obliged to carry a prefs of fail to keep the fhip off fhore, in doing which the hawfe-plugs, which according to a new improvement were put infide, were washed in, and the hawfe-bags washed away; in confequence of which they fhipped a large quantity of water on the gun-deck.

"On founding the well, and finding the fhip had fprung a leak, and had five feet water in her hold, they clued the main top-fail up, hauled up the main-fail, and immediately endeavoured to furl both, but could not effect it.—All the pumps were fet to work on difcovering the leak.

"Wednefday the 4th, at two in . the morning, they endeavoured to wear the fhip, but without fuccefs; and judging it neceffary to cut away the mizen mast, it was immediately done, and a fecond attempt made to wear the ship, which succeeded no better than the former; and the ship having now seven feet water in her hold, and gaining fast on the pumps, it was thought expedient, for the prefervation of the ship, to cut away the main-maft, the fhip appearing to be in immediate danger of foundering; in the fall of the mast, Jonathan Moreton, cockfwain, and four men, either fell or were drawn by the wreck overboard Vol. XXVIII.

and drowned, and by eight in the morning the wreck was cleared, and the thip got before the wind, in which polition the was kept about two hours, in which time the pumps cleared the flip of two feet of water in the hold: At this time the flip's head was brought to the eaftward with the fore-fail only.

"At ten in the morning the wind abated confiderably, and the fhip labouring extremely, rolled the fore top-maft over on the larboard fide ; in the fall the wreck went through the fore-fail, and tore it to pieces. At eleven in the forenoon, the wind came to the weftward, and the weather clearing up, the Berry-head was diffinguishable bearing north and by east, diftant four or five leagues; they now immediately bent another fore-fail, erected a jury main-maft, and fet a top-gallantfail for a main-fail, under which fail they bore up for Portfmouth, and employed the remainder of the day in getting up a jury mizen-maft.

" Thurfday the 5th, at two in the morning, the wind came to the fouthward, blew fresh, and the weather was very thick ; at noon Portland was feen bearing north and by east, distant two or three leagues. At eight at night it blew a drong gale at fouth, and at this time the Portland lights were feen bearing north-weft, diftant four or five leagues, when they wore the fhip, and got her head to the weftward, but finding they loft ground on that tack, they wore her again, and kept ftretching on to the eathward, in hopes to have weathered Peverelpoint, in which cafe they intended to have anchored in Studland-bay. At eleven at night it cleared, and they faw St. Alban's-head a mile and half to the leeward of them, up-[P]y on on which they took in fail immediately, and let go the fmall bower anchor, which brought up the fhip at a whole cable, and fhe rode for about an hour, but then drove; they now let go the fheet-anchor, and wore away a whole cable, and the fhip rode for about two hours longer, when fhe drove again.

" Whilit they were in this fituation, the captain fent for Mr. Henry Meriton, the chief officer who furvives, and afked his opinion as to the probability of faving their lives; to which he replied with equal calmnefs and candour, that he apprehended there was very little hope, as they were then driving fast on the fhore, and might expect every moment to firike; the boats were then mentioned, but it was agreed that at that time they could be of no use, yet in case an opportunity thould prefent itfelf of making them ferviceable, it was proposed that the officers should be confidentially requefted to referve the long-boat for the ladies and themfelves; and this precaution was immediately taken.

" About two in the morning of Friday the 6th, the ship still driving, and approaching very falt to the shore, the same officer again went into the cuddy, where the captain then was, and another converfation took place, Captain Pierce expressing extreme anxiety for the prefervation of his beloved daughters, and earnefly afking the officer if he could devife any means of faving them; and on his answering with great concern that he feared it would be impoffible, but that their only chance would be to wait for the morning, the captain lifted up his hands in filent and diffrefsful ejaculation.

." At this dreadful moment the fhip ftruck with fuch violence as to daft the heads of those who were ftanding in the cuddy against the deck above them; and the fatal blow was accompanied by a shriek of horror, which burst at one instant from every quarter of the ship.

" The feamen, many of whom had been remarkably inattentive and remifs in their duty during great part of the ftorm, and had actually skulked in their hammocks, and left the exertions of the pump, and the other labours attending their fituation, to the officers of the flip, and the foldiers, (who had been uncommonly active and affiduous during the whole tremendous conflict) rouzed by the deftructive blow to a fenfe of their danger, now poured upon the deck, to which no endeavours of their officers could keep them whilst their affistance might have been useful, and in frantic exclamations demanded of heaven and their fellow-fufferers, that fuccour, which their timely efforts might poffibly have fucceeded in procuring; but it was now too late, the fhip continued to beat on the rocks, and foon bulged, and fell with her broadfide towards the those : When the ship struck, a number of the men climbed up the enfign-ftaff, under an apprehenfion of her going to pieces immediately.

" Mr. Meriton, the officer whom we have already mentioned, at this crifis of horror, offered to thefe unhappy beings the beft advice which could poffibly be given to them; he recommended their coming all to that fide of the fhip which lay loweft on the rocks, and fingly to take the opportunities which might then offer of efcaping to the fhore. And having thus provided to the utmost of his power for the fafety of the defponding defponding crew, he returned to the round-houfe, where by this time all the paffengers, and moft of the officers, were affembled, the latter employed in offering confolation to the unfortunate ladies, and with unparalelled magnanimity fuffering their compafion for the fair and amiable companions of their miffortunes to get the better of the fenfe of their own danger, and the dread of almoit inevitable annihilation. At this moment, what must be the feelings of a father—of fuch a father as Captain Pierce !

"In this charitable work of offering comfort to the fair fufferers, Mr. Meriton now joined, by affurances of his opinion, that the fhip would hold together till the morning, when they would all be fafe: and Captain Pierce obferving one of the young gentlemen loud in his exprefiions of terror, and hearing him frequently exclaim that the thip was going to pieces, he chearfully bid him hold his peace; obferving to him, that though the fhip thould go to pieces, he would not, but would be fafe enough.

" It will now be neceffary to deferibe the fituation of the place which proved fatal to to many valuable and refpectable perfons, as without fuch a defeription it will be difficult to convey a proper idea of the melancholy, the deplorable feene.

"The fhip ftruck on the rocks at or near Seacombe, on the island of Purbeck, between Peverel Foint, and St. Alban's-head, at a part of the fhore where the cliff is of vaft height, and rifes almost perpendicular from its bafe.

"But at this particular fpot the cliff is excavated at the foot, and prefents a cavern of ten or twelve yards in depth, and of breadth equal to the length of a large fhip, the fides of the cavern fo nearly upright as to be extremely difficult of accefs, the roof formed of the flupendous cliff, and the bottom of it flrewed with fharp and uneven rocks, which feem to have been rent from above by fome convultion of nature.

" It was at the mouth of this cavern that the unfortunate wreck lay firetched almost from fide to fide of it, and offering her broadfide to the horrid chafm.

"But at the time the flip flrack, it was too dark to difcover the extent of their danger, and the extreme horror of their fituation; even Mr. Meriton himfelf conceived a hope that the might keep together till day-light, and endeavoured to chear, his drooping friends, and in particular the unhappy ladies, with this conifortable expectation, as an aniwer to the captain's enquiries, how they weat on, or what he thought of their fituation i

" In addition to the company already in the round houle, they had admitted three black women, and two foldiers wives, who with the hufband of one of them had been permitted to come in, though the feamen who had tumultuoufly demanded entrance, to get the lights, had been opposed, and kept out by Mr. Rogers, the third mate, and Mr. Brimer, the fitth, fo that the numbers there were now increased to near fifty; Captain Pierce fitting on a chair, cot, or fome other moveable, with a daughter on each fide of him, each of whom he alternately preffed to his affectionate bofoin; the reft of the melancholy affembly were feated on the deck, which was sleeved with monicel in-[P] :firaments, ftruments, and the wreck of furniture, trunks, boxes, and packages.

" And here also Mr. Meriton, having previoufly cut feveral wax candles into pieces, and fluck them up in various parts of the roundhouse, and lighted up all the glass lanthorns he could find, took his feat, intending to wait the happy dawn, that might prefent to him the means of effecting his own efcape, and afford him an opportunity of giving affiftance to the partners of his danger; but obferving that the poor ladies appeared parched and exhausted, he fetched a basket of oranges from fome part of the roundhouse, and prevailed on some of them to refresh themselves by sucking a little of the juice. At this time they were all tolerably composed, except Mifs Manfel, who was in hyfteric fits on the floor deck of the roundhoufe.

" But on his return to the company, he perceived a confiderable alteration in the appearance of the fhip, the fides were vifibly giving way, the deck feemed to be lifting, and he difcovered other ftrong fymptoms that fhe could not hold together much longer, he therefore attempted to go forward to look out, but immediately faw that the ship was feparated in the middle, and that the fore part had changed its position, and lay rather farther out towards the fea; and in this emergency, when the next moment might be charged with his fate, he determined to feize the prefent, and to follow the example of the crew, and the foldiers, who were now quitting the fhip in numbers, and making their way to a fhore, of which they knew not yet the horrors.

" Among other measures adopted to favour these attempts, the ensignftaff had been unfhipped, and attempted to be laid from the fhip's fide to fome of the rocks, but without fuccefs, for it fnapped to pieces before it reached them; however, by the light of a lanthorn, which a feaman, of the name of Burmafter, handed through the fky-light of the round-houfe to the deck, Mr. Meriton difcovered a fpar, which appeared to be laid from the fhip's fide to the rocks, and on this fpar he determined to attempt his efcape.

"He accordingly laid himfelf down on it, and thruft himfelf forward, but he foon found that the fpar had no communication with the rock; he reached the end of it, and then flipped off, receiving a very violent bruife in his fall; and before he could recover his legs, he was washed off by the furge, in which he supported himself by swimming, till the returning wave dashed him against the back part of the cavern, where he laid hold of a fmall projecting piece of the rock, but was fo benumbed, that he was on the point of quitting it, when a feaman who had already gained a footing, extended his hand, and affifted him till he could fecure himfelf on a little shelf of the rock, from which he clambered still higher, till he was out of the reach of the furf.

" Mr. Rogers, the third mate, remained with the captain, and the unfortunate ladies, and their companions, near twenty minutes after Mr. Meriton had quitted the fhip: Soon after the latter left the roundhoufe, the captain afked what was become of him? and Mr. Rogers replied that he was gone on the deck, to fee what could be done.--After this a heavy fea breaking over the fhip, the ladies exclaimed, ""Oh " Oh poor Meriton; he is drowned, had he flayed with us, he would have been fafe;" and they all, and particulary Mifs Mary Peirce, cxprefied great concern at the apprehension of his lofs.—On this occasion Mr. Rogers offered to go and call in Mr. Meriton; but this was oppofed by the ladies, from an apprehension that he might share the fame fate.

" At this time the fea was breaking in at the fore part of the fhip, and reached as far as the main-mait, and Captain Pierce gave Mr. Rogers a nod, and they took a lamp, and went together into the flerngallery, and after viewing the rocks for fome time, Captain Pierce afked Mr. Rogers if he thought there was any poffibility of faving the girls; to which he replied, he feared there was not, for they could only difcover the black face of the perpendicular rock, and not the cavern which afforded shelter to those who escaped; they then returned to the round-houfe, and Mr. Rogers hung up the lamp, and Captain Pierce, with his great coat on, fat down betweeu his two daughters, and ftruggled to suppress the parental tear which then burft into his eye.

"The fea continuing to break in very faft, Mr. M'Manus, a midfhipman, and Mr. Schutz, a pafienger, afked Mr. Rogers, what they could do to efcape; who replied, "Follow me," and they then all went into the ftern-gallery, and from thence by the weather upper quarter gallery upon the poop, and whilf they were there a very heavy fea fell on board, and the roundhoufe gave way, and he heard the ladies fhrick at intervals, as if the water had reached them, the noife of the fea at other times drowning their voices.

" Mr. Brimer had followed Mr. Rogers to the poop, where they had remained together about five minutes, when on the coming on of the laft-mentioned fea, they jointly feized a hen-coop, and the fame wave which he apprehended proved fatal to fome of thofe who remained below, happily carried him and his companion to the rock, on which they were dafhed with fuch violence as to be miferably bruifed and hurt.

"On this rock were twenty-feven men, but it was low water, and as they were convinced that upon the flowing of the tide they muft all be walhed off, many of them attempted to get to the back or fides of the cavern, out of the reach of the returning fea; in this attempt fearce more than fix, befides himfelf and Mr. Brimer, fucceeded; of the remainder fome fhared the fate which they had apprehended, and the others perifhed in their efforts to get into the cavern.

" Mr. Rogers and Mr. Brimer both however reached the cavern, and fcrambled up the rock, on narrow shelves of which they fixed themfelves : Mr. Rogers got fo near to his friend Mr. Meriton as to exchange congratulations with him; but he was prevented from joining him by at least twenty men who were between them, neither of whom could move without immediate peril of his life .- At the time Mr. Rogers reached this flation of polfible fafety his ftrength was fo nearly exhausted, that had the ftruggle continued a few minutes longer he must have been inevitably loft.

" 'They now found that a very confiderable number of the crew, feamen, foldiers, and fome petty efficers, were in the fame lituation with themfelves, though many who had reached the rocks below, had perished in attempting to afcend, what that fituation was they were full to learn; at prefent they had cleaped immediate death, but they were yet to encounter cold, nakednois, wind, rain, and the perpetual beating of the fpray of the fea, for a difficult, precarious, and doubtful chance of efcape.

"They could yet difern feme part of the fhip, and folaced themfeives, in their dreary flations, with the hope of its remaining entire till day-break, for, in the midfl of their own misfortunes, the fufferings of the females affected them with the moft acute anguifh, and every fea that broke brought with it terror, for the fate of thofe amiable and helplefs beings.

"But, alas! their apprehenfions were too foon realized. In a very few minutes after Mr. Rogers had gained the rock, an univerfal fhrick, which fill vibrates in their ears, and in which the voice of female diffrefs was lamentably diffinguithable, announced the dreadful cataftrophe; in a few moments all was hufhed, except the warring winds and beating waves: the wreck was buried in the remosfelefs deep, and not an atom of her was ever after diffeoreable.

" Thus perifhed the Halfewell, and with her worth, honour, fkill, beauty, amiability, and bright accomplifimments.

"Many of those who had gained the precarious stations which we have described, worn out with fatigue, weakened by bruifes, battered by the tempeth, and benumbed with the cold, quitted their holdfaths, and tumbling headlong either on the rocks below, or in the furf, perified beneath the feet of their wretched affeciates, and by their dying groaus, and gulping excla mations for pity, awakened terrific apprehenflows in the furvivors, of their own approaching fate.

" At length, after the bittereft three hours which mifery ever lengthened into ages, the day broke on them, but inflead of bringing with it the relief with which they had flattered themfelves, forved to difcover all the horrors of their fituation; they now found that had the country been alarmed by the guns of diffrefs which they had continued to fire for many hours before the fhip ftrack, but which from the violence of the florm were unheard, they could neither be obferved by the people from above, as they were completely ingulphed in the cavern, and over-hung by the cliff, nor did any part of the wreck remain to point out their probable place of refuge; below, no boat could live to fearch them out; and had it been poffible to have acquainted those who would with to affift them, with their exact fituation, no ropes could be conveyed into the cavity to facilitate their efcape.

"The only profpect which offered, was to creep along the fide of the cavern, to its outward extremity, and on a ledge fearcely as broad as a man's hand to turn the corner, and endeavour to clamber up the almost perpendicular precipice, whole fummit was near two hundred feet from the base.

And in this desperate effort did fonce fome fucceed, whilft others, trembling with terror, and their ftrength exhausted by mental and bodily fatigue, loft their precarious footing, and perished in the attempt.

" The first men who gained the fummit of the cliff, were the cook, and James Thompson, a quartermafter; by their own exertions they made their way to the land, and the moment they reached it, haftened to the nearest house, and made known the fituation of their fellow-fufferers.

" The houfe at which they first arrived was Eastington, the prefent babitation of Mr. Garland, fleward or agent to the proprietors of the Purbeck quarries, who immediately got together the workmen under his direction, and with the most zealous and animated humanity, exerted every effort for the prefervation of the furviving crew of this unfortunate fhip; ropes were procured with all poffible difpatch, and every precaution taken that affiftance fhould be fpeedily and effectually given; and we are happy in this opportunity of bearing teftimony, under the authority of the principal furviving officers, to the kind, benevolent, and spirited behaviour of this gentleman, whofe conduct on the melancholy occasion, entitles him to univerfal respect and regard, as well as to the particular gratitude of those who were the immediate objects of his philanthropy.

" Mr. Meriton made the attempt, and almost reached the edge of the precipice; a foldier who preceded him, had his feet on a finall projecting rock or flone, and on the fame stone Mr. Meriton had fastened his hands to help his progrefs ; at this critical moment the quarrymen arrived, and feeing a man fo nearly within their reach, they dropped a rope to him, of which he immediately laid hold, and in a vigorous effort to avail himfelf of this advantage, he loofened the flone on which he flood, which giving way, Mr. Meriton must have been precipitated to the bottom, but that a rope was providentially lowered to him at the inftant, which he feizea as he was in the act of falling, and was fafely drawn to the fummit.

" The fate of Mr. Brimer was peculiarly fevere; this gentleman, who had only been married nine days before the thip failed to a beautiful lady, the daughter of Captain Norman, of the royal navy, in which fervice Mr. Brimer was a lieutenant, but was now on a voyage to visit an uncle at Madras, came on fhore, as we have already obferved, with Mr. Rogers, and like him got up the fide of the cavern, where he remained till the morning, when he crawled out, and a rope being thrown to him, he was either fo benumbed with the cold as to fasten it about him improperly, or fo agitated, as to neglect making it fast at all; but from which ever caufe it arole, the effect was fatal to him; at the moment of his fuppofed prefervation he fell from his stand, and was unfortunately dashed to pieces, in the prefence of those who could only lament the deplorable fate of an antiable and worthy man, and an able and fkilful officer.

" As the day advanced, more affiftance was obtained; and as the life-preferving efforts of the turvivors would admit, they crawled to the extremities of the cavern, and prefented themfelves to their prefervers above, who flood prepared with the means which the fituation b!cow would permit them to exercise, to help them to the fummit.

" The method of affording this help was fingular, and does honour to the humanity and intrepidity of the quarry-men. The diffance from the top of the rock to the cavern was at least 100 feet, with a projection of the former of about 8 feet; ten of these formed a declivity to the edge, and the remainder of it was perpendicular. On the very brink of the precipice flood two daring fellows, a rope being tied round them, and fastened above to a ftrong iron bar fixed in the ground, behind them in like manner two more, and two more. Α ftrong rope alio, properly fecured, pafied between them, by which they might hold and fupport themfelves from falling; they then let down another rope, with a noofe ready fixed, below the cavern ; and the wind blowing hard, it was in some inftances forced under the projecting rock fufficiently for the fufferers to reach it without crawling to the extremity; in either cafe, whoever laid hold of it, put the noofe round his waift, and after elcaping from one element, committed himfelf full fwing to another, in which he dangled till he was drawn up with great care and caution.

" It is but juffice in this place to fay, that the furvivors received the friendly and humane affiftance of Mr. Jones and Mr. Hawker, gentlemen refident near the fpot.

"But in this attempt many fhared the fate of the unfortunate Mr. Brimer; and unable, through cold, weaknefs, perturbation of mind, or the incommodioufnefs of the flations they occupied, to avail themfelves of the fuccour which was offered them, were at laft precipitated from the flupendous cliff, and were either dafhed to pieces on the rocks beneath, or falling into the furge, perifhed in the waves.

" Among these unhappy sufferers, the deftiny of a drummer belonging to the military on board the Halfeweil, was attended with circumftances of peculiar diffrefs; being either washed off the rock by the ieas, or falling into the furf from above, he was carried by the counter-feas or returning waves, beyond the breakers, within which his utmoft efforts could never again bring him, but he was drawn further out to fea; and as he fwam remarkably well, continued to flruggle with the waves, in fight of his pitying companions, till his strength was exhausted, and he funk, to rife no more.

<sup>44</sup> It was not till late in the day that the furvivors were all conveyed to fafety, one indeed, William Trenton, a foldier, remained on his perilous fland till the morning of Saturday the 7th of January, expofed to the united horrors of the extremeft perfonal danger, and the moft acute difquietude of mind; nor is it eafy to conceive how his ftrength and fpirits could have fupported him for fuch a number of hours, under diftrefs fo poignant and complicated.

"Though the remains of the wreck were no longer difcoverable among the rocks, yet the furface of the fea was covered with the fragments as far almost as the eye could reach; and even so late as ten o'clock on the Friday morning, a steep, part of the live flock of the unfortunate officers, was observed buffeting the angry waves.

"The furviving officers, feamen, and foldiers, being now affembled at at the house of their benevolent friend, Mr. Garland, they were mustered, and found to amount to feventy-four, out of rather more than two hundred and forty, which was about the number of the crew and paffengers in the flip when the failed through the Downs; of the remainder, who unhappily loft their lives, upwards of feventy are fuppoled to have reached the rocks, but to have been washed off, or to perish in falling from the cliffs, and fifty or more to have funk with the captain and the ladies in the roundhouse, when the after-part of the fhip went to pieces.

** All those who reached the fummit furvived, except two or three, who are fupposed to have expired in drawing up, and a black, who died in a few hours after he was brought to the house, though many of them were so niferably bruised that their lives were doubtful, and they are fcarcely yet recovered."

On the 2d of Angust the following Article appeared in a London Gazette Extraordinary.

St. Jamcs's, Auguft z. "THIS morning, as his majetly was alighting from his carriage, at the gate of the palace, a woman who was waiting there, under pretence of prefenting a petition, thruck at his majefly with a knife, but providentially his majefly received no injury. The woman was immediately taken into cuftody, and upon examination, appears to be infane."

The circumflances attending this alarming event are thus related: As the king was alighting from his post-chariot, at the garden entrance of St. James's, the woman, who appeared very decently dreffed, in the act of prefenting a paper to his majefly, which he was receiving with great condefcention, ftruck a concealed knife at his breaft, which his majelty happily avoided by drawing back. As the was making a fecond thruft, one of the yeomen caught her arm, and, at the fame inflant, one of the king's footmen wrenched the knife from her hand. The king, with great temper and fortitude exclaimed, "I am not hart —take care of the poor woman—do not hurt her."

The fame day fhe underwent an examination before the privy council, when it appeared that her name was Margaret Nicholfon, daughter of George Nicholfon, of Stocktonupon-Tees; and that fhe had lived in feveral creditable fervices. Being afked where fhe had lived fince fhe left her last place? she answered franticly, " ihe had been all abroad fince that matter of the crown broke out."-Being afked what matter? fhe went on rambling, that the crown was her's-fhe wanted nothing but her right-that she had great property-that if the had not her right, England would be drowned in blood for a thousand generations. Being further asked where fhe now lived, the answered rationally, " At Mr. Fifk's, stationer, the corner of Wigmore-street, Marybone." On being questioned as to her right, fhe would answer none but a judge, her rights were a mystery. Being asked, if she had ever petitioned? fhe faid, fhe had, ten days ago. On looking back among the papers, fuch petition was found, full of princely nonfenfe about tyrants, usurpers, and pretenders to the throne, &c. &c.

Mr. Fisk being sent for and interrogated, terrogated, faid fhe had lodged with him about three years : that he had not obferved any firiking marks of infanity about her—the was certainly very odd at times—frequently talking to herfelf—that fhe lived by taking in plain work, &c. Others who knew her, faid, the was very industrious, and they never fuspected her of infanity.

Dr. Monro being fent for, faid, it was impossible to different with certainty immediately whether the was infane or not. It was propofed to commit her for three or four days to Tothillfields Bridewell. This was objected to, becaufe it was faid fhe was a flate-prifoner. At length it was agreed to commit her to the cuftody of a meffenger.

Her lodgings being examined, there were found three letters about her pretended right to the crown, one to Lord Mansfield, one to Lord Loughborough, and one to General Bramham, Aug. 12. Between the 2d inftant and this day, Margaret Nicholfon underwent fome farther examination, the refult of which appeared in the following article.

" Whiteball, Aug. 8, 1786.

PRESENT,

The Lords of his Majeity's most honourable privy council.

This day Margaret Nicholion, in cuftody for an attempt on his majefty's perfon, was brought before the lords of his majefty's moft honourable privy council, and after a full examination of Dr. John and Dr. Thomas Monro, and feveral other witneffes, concerning the fate of her mind, as well now as for fome time paft, and allo after examining the full Margaret Nicholion in perfon, their lordihips were clearly and unanimously of opinion, that the was and is infane.

W. FAWKENER."

In confequence of this determination, the unhappy woman was conveyed, on the 5th inftant, to a cell prepared for her in Bethlehem Hefpital.

The following Letters are feid to have been written by the late King of Pruflia, on the Death of Colonel Vantrofeke, a wery waluable Offiter in his Service, to the widow of that Officer.

Letter I.

" IIE death of Colonel Vau-trofcke, your hufband, commanding the regiment of Old Waldeck, has affected me in a very particular manner. By his death I am deprived of a brave and good officer; fuch was the reputation he enjoyed univerfally, and I know full well how to value the important fervices he has rendered me. The infignia of the order of Merit which he received from me, and which you return, with thanks to me for the favours I had conferred on him. will remain for you and your childreu everlafting tokens of the wellearned diffinction which he received at my hands. But I shall not stop here; you may, on the contrary, reft affured, that I certainly will neither forget the widow of fo deferving an officer, nor the children that he has left behind. Let me know, without any referve, the real ftate of your domeftic concerns at the moment of his death, the number and age of your children. Communicate this matter to me, as to one ever disposed to give you a preof of his benevolence."

Penjaan, Jan. 21.

In

In the king's own hand.

"P.S. I have honoured your hufband, as the model of an excellent officer; but fince, alas! he is no more, I fhall be to his children a father: I mean to do for them and his widow all that a parent could have done; let me have only the true flate of your means, and I engage to do the needful for the fatisfaction of the family."

Letter II.

" I SHALL between this and next Trinity lay out 20,000 rixdollars in the purchafe of an effate for your three children, the whole direction and management of which fhall remain in your hands. You mult apply to the ecclefiaftical department, to fee whether there be two vacancies in a nunnery within the county of Cleves, or the province of Weftphalia, for your two young ladies; when marriageable, I fhall take them away, and fettle them in the world.

(Signed) FREDERIC."

An Account of the Trial of George Robert Fitzgerald, E/guire, and his Affociates, at Callebar, in the County of Mayo, (Ireland) for the Murder of Patrick Randal M'Donnell, E/g.

MR. Fitzgerald was brought to the bar at half after eight o'clock in the morning of Friday, June 9, and given in charge to the jury, but not arraigned, he having pleaded Not Guilty, in April lait. He challenged fifteen of the jury peremptorily, and the Right Hon. the Attorney General alfo challenged fuch of the jury as he was informed flood in any degree of relationship to the deceafed; an honourable and uncommon proof of the defire to fee juilice administered, without the partiality of prejudice.

The jury being form, and the Attorney General having opened the profecution with great clearnefs, propriety, and ability, the following evidence was fubmitted to the court.

[The first witness called upon was Mr Gallagher; who, being first duly fworn, was interrogated, and deposed as follows:]

Q. Mr. Gallagher, do you remember the 20th of February?— A. I do, Sir, I have a very just right.

Q. Pray, Sir, did you know Mr. Patrick Randa! M Donnell ?-A. 1 did, Sir.

Q. Is he living or dead?—A. He is dead, Sir.

Q. Will you pleafe to relate to the court and the jury, from your own knowledge, how he came by his death, and keep your recital as diffinct from Hipson as you can, as the prefent indictment only concerns Mr. M'Dounell.-A. I will, Sir. Mr. M'Donnell, the deceafed, and Mr. Fitzgerald, the prifoner at the bar, lived near each other; they had frequent bickerings and difagreements; in confequence whereof Mr. Fitzgerald made many attempts to be revenged on Mr. M'Donnell, for fome fup-Mr. M'Donnell, posed offence. about eighteen months ago, was fired at from a window in Mr. Fitzgerald's house, which shot took place, and wounded Mr. M'Donnell in the leg; for this affault a man was indicted the affizes following at Cafflebar, and acquitted; in confequence of which, Mr. Fitgerald levelled his refentment not only againt gainft Mr. M'Donnell, but alfo against Mr. Charles Hipfon, who was murdered at the fame time with Mr. M'Donnell, and against me; I suppose for our using our utmost endeavours to bring to justice the perion who fired at Mr. M'Donnell, the deceased. On the 20th of February last, Mr. M'Donnell called upon me in the morning, in company with Mr. Hipfon, and requeited I would go with them to Mr. M'Donnell's houfe, as he, Mr. M'Donnell, wished to give some mecellary directions to his fervants, then at his houfe in the country; for Mr. M'Donnell declared to me he could not live in his house at Chancery-hall, in the county of Mavo, being in the neighbourhood of Mr. Fitzgerald, whom he reprefented as a blood-thirsty, unforgiving man; and accordingly took lodgings in the town of Cafflebar to avoid him. We rode off together, and, as we afterwards heard, about ten o'clock, Mr. Fitzgerald getting information of our being there, fent out a party to apprehend us on a warrant, furreptitioufly obtained from a Mr. O'-Meally (whom I fince understand has been degraded from his commission) for a supposed assault. On our receiving information that our enemy was in purfuit of us, we rode off from Mr. M'Donnell's, Chancery-hall, but finding ourfelves purfued, we stopped at a house on the road; and I knowing the refentment was principally levelled at Mr. M'Donnell, perfuaded him to conceal himfelf under fome malt, which he did; and in a fhort time Mr. Fitzgerald's party came up to the house, and after firing feveral fhot in at us, I went out, and demanded the reafon that they behaved with fuch outrage and violence?

To which they replied (John Fulton and Craig) that they had warrants against Mr. M'Donnell, Mr. Hipfon, and myfelf, but vehemently demanded Mr. M'Donnell. I informed them that he had rode off, and demanded to fee their warrants; which they refused, but burft into the house, and after fearching the house and out-houses, they found Mr. M'Donnell, and dragged him out; they then tied and brought us bound to Mr. Fitzgerald's, at Rockfield; when we arrived there, we alledged, that the crime we were accured of was at any rate bailable, and demanded to be brought before a magistrate, which was refuled, and we were kept at Mr. Fitzgerald's houfe that night, they pretending it was too late then to bring us before a magistrate.---We remained there that night, and were treated with the greatest indignity and infult. In carrying us prifoners to Mr. Fitzgerald's, they fuffered Mr. M'Donnell to ride, on account of the wound in his leg, but tied Mr. Hipfon and me together. On the morning of the 21st of February, we were brought out from Mr. Fitzgerald's under a guard, which flood ready to receive us; and I heard Mr. Fitzgerald, the prifoner at the bar, tell Andrew Craig, who is commonly called Scotch Andrew, " to be fure to fecure his prifoners; and if there was a refene to shoot them." - We were then led about two or three hundred yards from the house, when Andrew Craig called out, " A refcue ! a refcue !" on which a fhot was immediately fired from the rear, which killed one of Mr. Fitzgerald's guard, and wounded three or four more; the fire then foon became general, and Mr. M'Donnell received received a wound in the arm, and Mr. Hipfon and I received wounds, when we both fell, and I endeavoured to crawl into fome fern that was near me, and to conceal myfelf. Mr. M'Donnell's horfe took fright after the rider had been shot in the arm, and carried him a few yards on ; when, just at a bridge. he was feized by a perfon fixed there for the purpole, as there were guards fixed at all the paffes, and Andrew Craig fired at him, and fhot him through the body, on which he fell, and if any life remained in him, it was beat out by the butt end of a piftol, and the butt end of mufkets: they then fired at and killed Hipfon, and coming up to where I was, they were going to floot me, when one of them exclaimed, "We have no orders to kill him !" which faved my life. I was re-taken to Fitzgerald's houfe, where I was afterwards refcued by my friends.

Q. Do you fee any perfons now in court whom you can politively fwear were prefent at this outrage? —A. I can politively fivear that Mr. Fitzgerald was prefent at our fetting out, and that I heard him give the directions I have mentioned to Andrew Craig; and that he had a blunderbufs flung under his arm.

Cross examined.

Q. Was Mr. Fitzgerald prefent when you were first apprehended under the warrant of Mr. O'Meally?—A. He was not that I faw; I did not fee him till I was brought to his houfe.

Q. Did you fee him fire at Mr. Mr. M'Donnell, Mr. Hipfon, or you?—A. No; I only faw him give the directions to Andrew Craig that I have mentioned. [Next evidence produced was Andrew Craig, commonly called Scotch Andrew—who being duly fworn and examined, depoted a. follows:]

Q. Where did you live in the month of February laft?—A. With Mr. Fitzgerald, the prifoner at the bar.

Q. Did you get any directions from him on that day to do any thing particular?—A. I did.

Q. Now, Sir, relate to the court and the jury the particulars of those directions, as you know from your own knowledge. - A. On the 20th of February laft we received information that Mr. M'Donnell, the deceased, in company with Mr. Hipfon and Mr. Gallagher, were at Mr. M'Donnell's houfe; Mr. Fitzgerald then called to me, and, in in the prefence of John Fulton and -[Here he was interrupted by the counfel, who told him he was not to mention any perion who was not then upon his trial.]—Mr. Fitzgerald defired me to go and apprehend them on a warrant he had obtained from Mr. Juilice O'Meally, and to bring them to Rockfield; I was employed by Mr. Fitzgerald. as he always employed me in all his enormities .- [Here he was interrupted, and defired to confine himfelf to the question now before the court, and not to enter into any extraneous matters.] - We then brought Mr. M'Donnell, Mr. Hip. fon, and Mr. Gallagher (the gentleman that was examined here) prifoners to Rockfield. The next morning we fettled about the plan of murdering them-[Here he was interrupted by the question, Who fettled it? and he continued :]--Mr.Fitzgerald, Mr. Timothy Brecknock, Mr. John Fulton, and myfelf :

felf; we determined upon the meck refcue, and that my calling out " A refcue !" fhould be the word of command for thofe in the rear to fire, which they accordingly did. We determined to place fpics at the different paffes to prevent an efcape; and on Mr. M'Donnell's horfe running away with him after the firft fire, when he was thot in the arm, I came up with him on his being thopped, and fired at him.

Q. Did you receive infructions from any in court, and whom, to perpetrate this herrid act?—A. I did, from Mr. Fitzgerald himfelf, both before we went off, and as we were going out. He faid to me, "Secure the prifoners; and if there fhould be a refeve, or an attempt to refeve, fhoot them."

Q. Was the fcheme of the refcue planned or not, and by whom?— A. It was planned by Mr. Fitzgerald and those 1 have mentioned, and myfelf among the reft; but those were only privy to it; the reft were to attend as a guard, to fee them lodged fafe.

Q. I now afk you on your oath, was the refcue a real one, or a fictitious one, planned as you fay?— —A. It was a fictitious one, planned to commit the murder.

Q. Was that the purpole of it, on your oath ?—A. On my oath it was for no other purpole, but for an excufe to murder Mr. M'Donnell; and it was pre-concerted before we went out, that a man fhould be placed in an advantageous fpot, to fire at Mr. Fitzgerald's own men, to make them imagine the refcue was intended, except those that were privy to the fcheme.

Q Was Mr. M'Donnell murdered in confequence of the plan you have mentioned ?—A. He was. [Craig was then crofs-examined; fimply, to whether Mr. Fitzgerald fired at any of the people murdered? To which he answered, he believed he did not; for it was before determined, that he (Craig) should murder him, or fee it done by others.]

Here closed the examination on the part of the crown; and on Mr. Fitzgerald being called upon, and told, then was the time for him to make his defence, he replied, he would leave every thing to his counfel employed for him.

His leading counfel then mentioned, that they would call a number of witneffes to prove an alibi on the part of Mr. Fitzgerald.

Several witneffes were then called on the part of Mr. Fitzgerald, and all tended to the fame alibi, of his not being prefent the time the actual murders were committed; but proved nothing as to the directions and pre-concerted fchemes laid for the deftruction of Mr. M'Donnell.

THE CHARGE.

The prefent is one of the moft momentous and important trials that ever came before a court; and through the whole of this melancholy bufine's every feeling mind muft be happy to perceive that impartiality and temperance which has diftinguished the conduct of those who were appointed to bring to juftice the authors of a deed not lefs horrible than degrading to human nature; and however inclinable I may be to lean to the fide of mercy in all criminal cafes, yet in the prefent cafe, I must confess that fuch aggravated guilt never appeared before me. It is far from my intention or with that any thing I could this day tay fay to you fhould bias your opinion; you are gentlemen of confequence in this county, and I am firmly perfuaded of the strictest impartiality, and your verdict of confequence must be the refult of justice. You are in poffession of established facts, from which you will doubtlefs draw fair inferences, untarnished with any unfavourable opinion which you may have previously received against the prisoner now upon his trial, and entirely uninfluenced by any impression which an affair that has been represented in the most flocking colours, both in private convertations and in the public prints, muit have made on you.

'Tis not my province to prefcribe the neceffary verdict for you to bring in; you are as good judges of the facts which appear before you as I am, and by those must be directed; if any doubt as to any point of law occurs to your mind, I will, with pleafure, as will my brother, explain it, and give you every affiftance; and from my knowledge of you, I again repeat, your determination will be the refult of wifdom, impartiality, and juttice. The fpirit of the laws may fometimes be ftretched to a mistaken tenderness, and there are instances where lenity may be repugnant to juffice.

The jury retired, after a fitting of fixteen hours, and in fourteen minutes brought in their verdict, guilty.

On Saturday the 10th, John Fulton, William Fulton, Archibald Newing, or Ewing, John Rcheney, and David Simpfon, were alfo found guilty, upon two indictments, for the murder of Patrick Randal M<sup>4</sup>-Donnell and Charles Hipfon.

And, fame day, James Foy, John Cox, James Mafterfon, David Saltry, otherwife Simpfon, Philip Cox, John Berney, Humphry George, Michael Bruen, William Robin, and Wallis Kelly, were feverally acquitted of the faid murder.

After which trials, the Right Hon. the Attorney General informed the court, that he was given to underfland a motion was intended to Le made in arreft of judgment. He defired that Mr. Fitzgerald might be brought up, and the motion gone Mr. Fitzgerald's leading into. counfel faid, they faw no defest in the indiAment; but Mr. Stanlev declared that he had warm hopes he could fnew ground to arreft judgment, if he were allowed time to confider the fubject till Monday. The Attorney General called upon him to flate his objections, which he, Mr. Stanley, declined.

The Attorney General informed Mr. Stanley, that it would probably affift him in the motion to arreft judgment, if he was informed what the indiftment was, as he never had hitherto called to have it read, but had relied on the fliort abfract of it in the crown-book; accordingly, at the defire of the Attorney General, the indiftment was read to him; and the court, with remarkable humanity, allowed Mr. Stanley till Monday to confider his motion.

MONDAY, June 12.

This day Timothy Brecknock was called upon to take his trial, and given in charge to the jury upon two indiffments, for confpiring and procuring the death of Patrick Randal M<sup>4</sup>Donnell and Charles Hipfoa. The evidence having fully citablined the charges in the indictments, the jury found him guilty.

After Brecknock's conviction, the Chief Buren ordered the clerk of the

the crown to call up for fentence thofe perfons who had been convicted of actually perpetrating the murder; which fentence he then paffed npon John Fulton and his other affociates, in the most affecting manner.

The Chief Baron then defired to know of Mr. Stanley, whether he meant to make his promifed motion in arreft of judgment? but at the fame time warmly recommended to him, unlefs there was a folid ground of objection to the indictment, not to make his motion, as it muft neceffarily be made in Mr. Fitzgerald's prefence, and might pofiibly derange his feelings, which, he faid, he was happy to hear were calm and compofed. Mr. Stanley, on confideration, declined to make any motion in arreft of judgment.

Mr. Fizgerald was then brought to the bar of the court, and the Chief Baron, after a preface which drew tears from almost all who heard him, on the enormity of the crime, paffed fentence of death upon George Robert Fitzgerald and Timothy Brecknock, with orders for their execution on that day.

Mr. Fitzgerald behaved with composition of the second second second second to make his peace with Heaven. To this the Chief Baron answered, that the nature of his crime was fo dreadful, and it had been fo fully proved against him, that public justice required he should be made an immediate example.

They were removed from the court to the gaol. At fix o'clock in the evening George Robert Fitzgerald, Timothy Brecknock, and John Fulton, were conducted to the place of execution, on the hill near the Caftle, at Caftlebar, where they were feverally executed according to their fentence.

On Mr. Fitzgerald's coming out of the prifon he feemed to be collected, but turning his eyes on the wonderful multitude which attended his execution, he lost all his fortitude, and giving a fort of a wild fhriek, continued weeping during his way to the fatal fpot; but Brecknock seemed at intervals devoted to prayer; his countenance bore firong traits of philosophy and innocence; he uttered fome expressions which were thought incoherent by the multitude. Brecknock was first turned off, and met his fate with a fortitude and compofure worthy a better caufe. Fulton feemed penitent, and died with firmnefs.

After hanging the ufual time, they were feverally cut down, and their bodies cut or fcarred.

The other four convicts, John Reheny, Archibald Newing, William Fulton, and David Simpfon, were ordered for execution on a future day.

After the verdict of the jury against Mr. Fitzgerald, he requested to have fome private conference with Mr. Browne, the high fheriff; the latter confented, on condition of having a friend prefent. What paffed on the occafion did not transpire; but the fheriff and his friend accompanied him to the prifon, where, having walked about his room in fome perturbation, he threw himfelf on a bed, and continued lying on his face above three hours and a half without uttering a word. He wore a loofe great coat, and had his head bound round with a handkerchief.

Refolutions

Refolutions of the British Inhabitants at Calcutta, relative to Mr. Pitt's East India Bill.

A T a meeting of the British in-habitants of Calcutta, held at the Theatre on Monday the 25th of July, in purfuance of a public fummons by the high sheriff, at the request of the grand jury, on the 15th of June last, for the purpose of taking into confideration the propriety and neceffity of a petition on certain parts of an act of the 24th of his prefent majesty, intituled, " An act for the better re-" gulation of the affairs of the Eaft " India Company, and of the British " possessions in India, and for esta-" blifhing a Court of Judicature " for the more speedy and effectual " trial of perfons accufed of of-" fences committed in the East In-" dies," the following refolutions were proposed, and unanimously agreed to:

ties of exceffive feverity, is grievous and oppressive to the fervants of the faid company, and repugnant to the conflitution of our country.

III. Refolved, That the erection of a new tribunal by the laid act, for the fpecial purpole of trying offences, charged to have been committed in the East Indies; a tribunal unrestrained by the settled rules of law, and fubject to no appeal, and the depriving them of their undoubted birthright, the trial by jury, are violations of the great charter of our liberties, and infringements of the most facred principles of the British constitution.

IV. Refolved, That the faid act, by exposing his majesty's subjects refiding under this prefidency, to be fent forcibly to England, and there to be tried for offences committed, or charged to be committed by them within these provinces, is highly dangerous to the fecurity of their perfons and fortunes.

V. Refolved, That it is injurious to the fervants of the United Company to be fubject, by the faid act of parliament, to be difmiffed from their employments in the Eaft Indies, or to be recalled at the pleafure of the crown, which is, in other words, at the will of the minister.

VI. Refolved, That the provifion of the faid act of parliament, which enacts, That all writings, which shall have been transmitted from the East Indies to the court of directors, by their officers or fervants refident in the East Indies, in the usual course of their correspondence with the faid court of directors, may be admitted by the commiffioners to be offered in evidence, and shall not be deemed inadmissible, or incompetent, is fubverfive of the established rules of ovidence, and manifeftly dangerous to his majetty's jubjects returning from this country to Great Britain.

VII. Refelved, That it is therefore becoming, and highly expedient for his majefly's fubjects in thefe provinces to endeavour by all legal and conflitutional means to obtain a repeal of fuch claufes in the faid act of parliament, as impofe thofe and other hardfhips upon them. And that for the purpofe of obtaining fuch repeal, petitions, humbly laying our grievances before his majefly and the two houfes of parliament, are advitable, neceflary, and proper.

VIII. Refolved, That a committee of fifteen gentlemen, felected for the inhabitants of Calcutta, be appointed to prepare petitions to his majefty and the two houses of parliament, and to correspond with the inland flations fubordinate to this government, and with the other prefidencies in India: and that it be recommended to them to take all fuch measures as they shall judge. neceffary for transmitting the faid petitions to Europe, and for promoting and obtaining an effectual redrefs to his majefty's fubjects in India. And that the faid committee be empowered to fill up vacancies, as they may happen in the course of time.

IX. Refolved, That as confiderable expence muft be unavoidably incurred by our endeavours to obtain redrefs of our grievances, a fubfeription fhall be opened by the committee who fhall be clefted by this affembly; and that as foon as the petition fhall be ready for fignature, a book fhall be produced for the faid fubfeription, to the end that every man may have the opportunity of promoting, by a voluntary factifice of a fmall fhare of his property, that fecurity of the whole, which is the grand object of our petitions.

X. Refolved, That all fubfcriptions be received, whether in fpecie, or in paper, and that the amount fubfcribed shall be paid by each fubfcriber to fuch perfon or perfons as the faid committee, when elected, shall appoint to receive the fame.

XI. Refolved, That this affembly do authorize the faid committee to difpofe of and expend the whole, or any part of the fums of money fo paid, in fuch manner as fhall appear to them beft calculated for. the general benefit of the caufe for which they were fubferibed.

XII. Refolved, That Mr. Charles Purling be a member of the committee, and that he be requefted to propofe fourteen other gentlemen, to the meeting for their approval.

XIII. Refolved, That the following gentlemen are elected for the purposes mentioned in the foregoing refolutions, viz.

Colonel Patrick Duff, Captain John Murray, Captain Peter Murray, Captain William Scott, Captain Herbert Lloyd, Charles Purling, John Briflow, eremiah Church, William Cowper, Heary Vaniittart, John Evelyn, Ionathan Duncan, George Dallas, Thomas Henry Davis, and Philip Yonge, Efqrs.

XIV. Refolved, That the affembly of the British inhabitants of Calcutta, having the most perfect confidence confidence and truft in the uprightnefs, integrity, and abilities, of the committee chosen for the conduct and management of their interest, and for the protection and defence of their rights, as subjects of Great Britain, do, in order to give vigour and efficacy to their acts, and to free them from future trouble, embarraffment, and obstruction, delegate to them full authority; and do exprefs a plenary reliance on them for the exercise of it, and do pledge to them the concurrence and fupport of the faid affembly, in the fullest manner possible, to all meafures they shall legally adopt, for obtaining a repeal of the opprefive parts of the aforefaid act of parliament.

XV. Refolved, That the thanks of this meeting be given to the grand jury, for having convened a legal and confitutional meeting of the Britifh fubjects in this fettlement, for the purpose of petitioning his majesty, and the two houses of parliament, for redress of those heavy gricvances imposed on them by the before-mentioned act of the legislature.

STATE PAPERS.

His Majefty's most gracious Speech to both Houses of Parliament, on the opening of the Third Seffion of the Sixteenth Parliament of Great Britain, 24th January 1786.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

SINCE I last met you in parliament, the difputes which appeared to threaten an interruption to the tranquillity of Europe have been brought to an amicable conclusion; and I continue to receive from foreign powers the strongest assurances of their friendly disposition towards this country.

At home, my fubjects experience the growing bleffings of peace in the extension of trade, the improvement of the revenue, and the increase of the public credit of the nation.

For the farther advancement of those important objects, I rely on the continuance of that zeal and industry which you manifested in the last fession of parliament.

The refolutions which you laid before me, as the bafis of an adjuftment of the commercial intercourfe between Great Britain and Ireland, have been by my directions communicated to the parliament of that kingdom; but no effectual flep has hitherto been taken thereupon which can enable you to make any farther progress in that falutary work.

Gentlemen of the Houfe of Commons,

I have ordered the effimates for the prefent year to be laid before you: it is my earnest wish to enforce economy in every department ; and you will, I am perfuaded, be equally ready to make fuch provision as may be necessary for the public fervice, and particularly for maintaining our naval ftrength on the most fecure and respectable footing. Above all, let me recomcommend to you the effablishment of a fixed plan for the reduction of the national debt. The flourishing ftate of the revenue will, I truft, enable you to effect this important meafure, with little addition to the public burdens.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The vigour and refources of the country, io fully manifested in its prefent fituation, will encourage you in continuing to give your utmost attention to every fubject of national concern; particularly to the confideration of such measures as may be neceffary, in order to give farther security to the revenue, and to promote and extend, as far as possible, the trade and general industry of my subjects.

The

The humble Address of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in Parliament assembled, to the King, for the foregoing Speech, January 25, 1786.

W E your majefty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the lords spiritual and temporal, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your majesty our humble thanks for your majesty's most gracious speech from the throne.

We affure your majefty, that imprefied with the fulleft conviction of the bleffings which refult from a ftate of general peace, it affords us great fatisfaction to be informed, that the difputes which appeared to threaten an interruption to the tranouillity of Europe have been brought to an amicable conclution; and that your majefty continues to receive from foreign powers the ftrongeft affurances of their friendly difpolition towards this country,

We affure your majelty, that earneftly interested in whatever may contribute to the ftrength and fplendour of the nation, and the wealth of your majefty's fubjects, we cannot but be deeply femible of the advantages which must be derived from the extension of trade, the improvement of the revenue, and the increase of the public credit

We affure your majefty, that the promotion of the common intereft and profperity of all your majefty's fabjects, was the object of those refolutions which we humbly laid before your majefty in the laft fession of parliament, as the foundation of a permanent and equitable adjuftment of the commercial intercourfe between Great Britain and Ireland; but no effectual flep having been taken in confequence of them by the parliament of Ireland, the progrefs of that measure, however falutary, cannot properly become the fubject of our prefent confideration.

We humbly intreat your majefty to be perfuaded, that the vigour and refources of the country, which, with heart-felt fatisfaction, we obferve are fo fully manifelted in its prefent fituation, cannot fail to excite a still more active attention to the important objects of national concern which your majeity is pleafed to recommend to our confideration; and particularly to fuch meafures as may be necessary to give farther fecurity to the revenue, and to promote and extend, as far as poffible, the general industry of our country.

His Majefty's most gracious Answer.

My Lords,

I thank you for this very dutiful and loyal address.

1 receive with great fatisfaction your affarances, that you will give the firihest attention to the important objects of national concern, which I have recommended to your confideration.

The humble Addreps of the House of Commons to the King, for the foregoing Speech, January 26, 1785.

Moft gracious Sovereign,

Y T / E, your majeity's most dutiful and loyal subjects the Commons of Great Britain, in parliament assembled, beg leave to return your majesty our humble thanks, for your most gracious speech from the throne.

We learn, with great fatisfaction, that the difputes which appeared to threaten threaten an interruption to the tranquillity of Europe have been brought to an amicable conclusion; and that your majefly continues to receive from foreign powers the firongeft affurances of their friendly difposition towards this country.

We are deeply fenfible of the bleffings which we experience from the enjoyment of peace, in the extenfion of trade, the improvement of the revenue, and the increafe of the public credit of the nation : and your majefly may rely on the utmost exertion of our zeal and indultry for the farther advancement of thefe important objects.

In order to promote, as far as in us lay, the common interefts of all your majefly's fubjects, we humbly laid before your majefly, in the lait feilion of parliament, feveral refolutions, as the bafis of an adjuftment of the commercial intercourfe between Great Britain and Ireland; but, as no effectual flep has been hitherto taken thereupon by the parliament of that kingdom, we do not find ourfelves at prefent enabled to make any further progrefs in that falutary work.

We cannot refrain from offering the warmeft expressions of our gratitude for your majefty's gracious affurances of your earnest with to enforce æconomy in every department: we shall be equally ready, at all times, to make fuch provision as may be neceffary for every branch of the public fervice, particularly for maintaining the naval ftrength of these kingdoms on the most fecure and respectable sooting. Fully imprefied with the accessity of effablifting a fixed plan for the reduction of the national debt, we shall lefe no time in entering on that important confideration; and it will afford us the most folid fatisfaction to find that this most definable object may be attained with little addition to the public burdens.

The vigour and refources to happily manifefted in our prefeat fituation muft giverencouragement and confidence to all your majefty's fubjects, and cannot fail to animate our exertions in endeavouring, by a continued attention to the fecurity of the revenue, and the extension of trade, to confirm and improve the increasing prosperity of the empire.

His Majefty's most gracious Answer.

Gentlemen,

I thank you for this very loyal addrefs. I receive with great fatisfaction the affurances of your difpolition to enter with zeal and indufiry into the confideration of those important and falutary objects whick I have recommended to your attention.

The Speech of his Grace Charles, Duke of Rutland, Lord Lieutenant of Ircland, to both Houfes of Parliament, at the opening of the Seffions there, on Thursday, January 19, 1786.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

T is with great fatisfaction, that, in obedience to his majefly's commands, I meet you again in perliament. You will, I am perfuaded, give your utmost attention to the various objects of public concern, which require your confideration. Your natural folicitude for the welfare of Ireland, and a full fenfe of her real interefts, will direct all your deliberations, and point point out to you the line of conduct which may be most conducive to the public advantage; and to that lasting connection between the fister kingdoms, fo effential to the prosperity of both.

Gentlemen of the Houfe of Commons,

I have ordered the public accounts, and other neceffary papers, to be laid before you. The principle which you fo wifely eftablithed of preventing the accumulation of the national debt, will, I hope, appear already to have proved fuccefsful; and I entertain no doubt, that your wifdom will perfevere in meafures, which, in their operation, promise such beneficial effects. His inajetty relies with confidence upon your grant of fuch fupplies as are neceffary for the public fervice, and for the honourable fupport of his government.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

A fystematic improvement of the police, and a vigorous execution of the laws, are effential not only to the due collection of the public revenue, but to the fecurity of private property, and indeed to the protection of fociety. The frequent outrages which have been committed in fome parts of the kingdom, will particularly call your attention to this important object.

It is unneceffary for me to recommend the protestant charterfchools to your protection, or to enumerate the happy effects which may be derived from your continued attention to the linen and other manufactures, to the agriculture, and to the fisheries of the kingdom, and to fuch meafures as may animate the industry, extend Vot. XXVIII. the education, and improve the morals of the people.

It will ever be my ambition to promote the real interefts of Ireland, and to contribute by all the means in my power towards eftablifhing its future profperity on the fureft and moft latting foundation.

The Speech of the Right Honourable the Speaker of the Houfe of Conzmons in Ireland, to his Grace Charles, Duke of Rutland, Lord Lieutenant, on Tuefday the 21st of March, upon the prefenting the Money Bills at the Bar of the House of Lords.

May it pleafe your Grace,

HE expences of this kingdom had for a feries of years, as well in time of peace as war, confiantly exceeded its revenue, and debt increafed on debt.

Where fuch a fyitem is fuffered to prevail, manufactures muil at length give way, trade will decline, and agriculture ceafe to produce wealth or plenty. The commons, therefore, in the laft feffion, witely determined to put a ftop to for ruinous a fyftem, and with a fpirited attention to the true intereft of their country, and the honourable fupport of his majefly's government, they voted new taxes to increafe the revenue of the year, in the fum of 140,0001.

The effort was great, and the event has proved its wildom. No further addition is now wanting no loan or act of credit is neceflary —a fituation unknown to this kingdom for many fellions paft, and marking with peculiar force the happy ara cr yoar grace's adminifiration.

Animated by this fuccefs, and determined to perfevere in the principle of preventing the accumulation of debt, his majefly's faithful commons have, in this feffion, continued the fame taxes, and granted all the supplies that were defired, to the full amount of every effimated expence; nor have they omitted at the fame time to provide for the speedy reduction of the nazional debt by a confiderable finking fund, and to continue to the agriculture, the fifheries, and the rifing manufactures of the kingdom, the bounties necessary for their fupport.

Great as thefe taxes are, they are liberally and cheerfully given, in the molt firm and full confidence, that from your grace's experienced wildom and affection for this kingdom, they will be found effectually to answer the end proposed, of fupplying the whole of the public expence, and preventing any further accumulation of debt.

The bills which I have the honour to prefent to your grace, for the royal affent, are, &c. &c. &c.

The Speech of his Grace Charles, Duke of Rutland, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, to both Houfes of Parliament, on clofing the Sofficin, Minday, May 8, 1786.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Have feen, with great fatisfaction, the conftant attention and uncommon diffatch with which you have gone through the public bufinefs. I am thereby enabled now to relieve you from further attendance in parliament. The harmony of your deliberations has given no lefs efficacy than dignity to your proceedings; and I am confident that you will carry with you the fame difpofition for promoting the public welfare to your refidence in the country, where your prefence will encourage the induitry of the people, and where your example and your influence will be happily exerted in etablifhing general good order and obedience to the laws.

Gentlemen of the Houfe of Commons,

I am to thank you in his majefty's name for the liberal fupplies which you have given for the public fervice, and for the honourable fupport of his majefty's government. They fhall be faithfully applied to the purpofes for which they were granted. My reliance upon your decided fupport to the execution of the laws for the juft collection of the public revenue, affords me the beft founded hope, that the produce of the duties will not fall thort of their effimated amount.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The determined fpirit with which you have marked your abhorence of all lawlefs diforder and tumult, hath, I doubt not, already made an ufeful impreffion : and the falutary laws enacted in this feffion, and particularly the introduction of a fystem of police, are honourable proofs of your wildom, your moderation, and your prudence.

His majefty beholds, with the higheft fatisfaction, the zeal and loyalty of his people of Ireland; and I have his majefty's express commands to affure you of the most cordial returns of his royal favour and paternal affection.

I have the deepell fenfe of every obligation to confirm my attachment

His Majefty's Speech to both Houfes of Parliament, on clofing the Seffion of Parliament, Wednefday, July 11, 1736.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

Cannot close this fession of parliament without expressing the particular fatisfaction with which I have observed your diligent attention to the public business, and the measures you have adopted for improving the resources of the country.

Gentlemen of the Houfe of Commons,

I thank you for the fupplies which you have granted for the fervice of the current year, and for the provision you have made for difcharging the incumbrances on the revcnue applicable to the uses of my civil government. The most falutary effects are to be expected from the plan adopted for the reduction of the national debt; an object which I confider as infeparably connected with the effential interests of the public.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The affurances which I continue to receive from abroad promife the continuance of general tranquillity.

The happy effects of peace have already appeared in the extension of the national commerce; and no measures shall be wanting, on my part, which can tend to confirm these advantages, and to give additional encouragement to the manusactures and industry of my people.

Impelled at once by duty and inclination, your majefty's faithful citizens of London are happy in tendering an unfeigned affurance of their affection and zeal for your majefty's perfor and government.

tained by its mournful termination, the late horrid occurrence (which threatened that national calamity) could not fail to excite in their minds a proportionate alarm; but more particularly painful and fevere were their fenfations, on reflecting that your majefly's gracious attention to the petitions of your fubjects had proved the lamentable caufe of exposing your facred perion to danger.

Permit us, royal fir, to add our molt fervent prayers, that your reign may continue long and profperous over free, happy, and united fubjects; and that your defcendants may transmit the bleflings the nation now enjoys to the latest pofterity.

ANSWER.

I receive, with the greateft pleafure, the very affectionate expreffions of your duty and attachment to me, and thank you for your congratulations upon the providential deliverance from the attack which has been lately made upon ray perfon: those profefions cannot but be acceptable to me from my loyal city of London, to whom I am always disposed to shew every mark of attention and regard.

Treaty of Alliance and Commerce between his Majesty Frederick III. King of Prassia, and the United Stotes of America, as ratified by Congress, May 7, 1786.

IS majesty the king of Prussia and the United States of America, defiring to fix, in a permanent and equitable manner, the rules to be observed in the intercourse and commerce they defire to establish between their respective countries, have judged, that the faid end cannot be better obtained than by taking the most perfect equality and reciprocity for the basis of their agreement.

With this view, his majefty the king of Pruffia has nominated and conflituted, as his plenipotentiary, the baron Frederic William de Thulemeyer, envoy extraordinary with their High Mightinesses the States General of the United Netherlands; aud the United States have, on their part, given full powers to John Adams, efq. now minister plenipotentiary of the United States with his Britannic majesty, Dr. Benjamin Franklin, and Thomas Jefferfon, respective plenipotentiaries, have concluded articles, of which the following is an abitract, fo far as concerns the States of America.

The fubjects of his majefty the king of Pruília may frequent all the coafts and countries of the United States of America, and refide and trade there in all forts of produce, manufactures, and merchandize, and fhall pay within the faid United States no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatfoever, than the most favoured nations are or shall be obliged to pay; and they fhall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which the most favoured nation does or fhall enjoy ; fubmitting themfelves to the laws and ufages there eftablished.

In like manner, the citizens of the United States of America may frequent all the coafts and countries of his majefty the king of Prufila, and refide and trade there in all forts of produce, manufactures, and merchandize, merchandize, and fhall pay in the dominions of his faid majefty no other or greater duties, charges, or fees whatfoever, than the moft favoured nation is or fhall be obliged to pay; and they fhall enjoy all the rights, privileges, and exemptions, in navigation and commerce, which the moft favoured nation does or fhall enjoy; fubmitting themfelves as aforefaid.

Each party shall have a right to carry their own produce, manufactures, and merchandize, in their own or any other veffels, to any parts of the dominions of the other, where it fhall be lawful for all the fubjects or citizens of that other freely to purchase them; and thence to take the produce, manufactures, and merchandize of the other, which all the faid citizens or fubjects shall in like manner be free to fell, paying in both cafes fuch dutics, charges, and fees only, as are or shall be paid by the most favoured nation.

Each party fhall endeavour to protect and defend all veffels, and other effects, belonging to the citizens or fubjects of the other, which fhall be within the extent of their jurifdiction by fea or land; and fhall ufe all their efforts to recover, and caufe to be reflored to their right owners, their veffels and effects which fhall be taken from them within the extent of their faid jurifdiction.

If one of the contracting parties fhould be engaged in war with other powers, the free intercourfe and commerce of the fubjects or citizens of the party remaining neuter, with the belligerent powers, fhall not be interrupted. On the contrary, in that cafe, as in full peace, the vessels of the neutral party may navigate freely to and from the ports, and on the coafts of the belligerent parties, free veifels making free goods, infomuch that all things fhall be adjudged free which fhall be on board any veifel belonging to the neutral party, although fuch things belong to an enemy of the other; and the fame freedom fhall be extended to perfons who fhall be on board a free veffel, although they fhould be enemies to the other party, unlefs they be foldiers in actual fervice of fuch enemy.

In the fame cafe of one of the contracting parties being engaged in war with any other power-to prevent all the difficulties and mirunderstandings which usually arise refpecting the merchandize heretofore called contraband, fuch as arms, ammunition, and military flores of every kind—no fuch articles carried in the veffels, or by the fubjects or citizens of one of the parties to the enemies of the other, shall be deemed contraband, fo as to induce confication or condemnation, and a los of property to individuals. Butin the calefuppoled-of a veffel itopped for the articles heretofore deemed contraband, if the master of the yeffel ftopped will deliver out the goods fuppofed to be of contraband nature, he shall be admitted to do it, an ! the veffel shall not in that case be carried into any port, nor further detained, but shall be allowed to proceed on her voyage.

If the contracting parties shall be engaged in war against a common enemy, the following points shall be observed between them.

If. If a verifiel of one of the parties, retaken by a privateer of the other, fhall not have been in pofferfion of the enemy more than twen-[R]; ty-f, r ty-four hours, fhe fhall be reftored to the first owner for one third of the value of the veffel and cargo; but if the thall have been more than twenty-four hours in poffession of the enemy, the thall belong wholly to the re-captor. 2d, If in the fame cafe the re-capture were by a public veffel of war of the one party, reftitution shall be made to the owner of one thirtieth part of the veffel and cargo, if the fhall not have been in the polleffion of the enemy more than twenty-four hours; and one tenth of the faid value where fhe fhall have been longer; which fums shall be distributed in gratuities to 3d, The reffitution the re-captors. in the cafes aforefaid shall be after due proof of property, and furety given for the part to which the recaptois are entitled. 4th, The veffels of war, public and private, of the two parties, fhall be reciprocally admitted with their prizes into the respective ports of each; but the faid prizes shall not be discharged nor fold there, until their legality fhall have been decided according to the laws and regulations of the ftate to which the captors belong, but by the judicators of the place into which the prize shall have been conducted. 5th, It shall be free to each party to make fuch regulations as they fhall judge neceffary for the conduct of their respective vessels of war, public or private, relative to the veffels which they shall take and carry into the ports of the two parties.

Where the parties shall have a common enemy, or shall both be neutral, the vessel of war of each shall upon all occasions take under their protection the vessels of the other going the same course, and shall defend such vessels as long as they hold the fame courfe, against all force and violence, in the fame manner as they ought to protect and defend veffels belonging to the party of which they are.

If war should arife between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country, then refiding in the other, shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and fettle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hinderance.

This treaty fhall be in force during the term of ten years from the exchange of ratifications.

Convention between his Britannic Majefty and the King of Spain, figned at London, the 14th of July, 1786.

HE kings of England and of Spain, animated with the fame defire of confolidating, by every means in their power, the friendfhip friendship so happily sublishing between them and their kingdoms, and wishing, with one accord, to prevent even the fladow of mifunderstanding which might be occafioned by doubts, milconceptions, or other causes of disputes between the fubjects on the frontiers of the two monarchies, especially in diftant countries, as are those in America, have thought proper to fettle, with all possible good faith, by a new convention, the points which might one day or other be productive of fuch inconveniencies, as the experience of former times has very often shewn. To this end, the king of Great Britain has named the most noble and most excellent lord Francis, baron Ofborne of Kiveton, marquis of Carmarthen, his Britannic majesty's privy counsellor, and principal fecretary of ftate for the department of foreign affairs, &c. &c. &c. and the catholic king has likewise authorised Don Bernardo del Campo, knight of the noble order of Charles the Third, fecretary of the fame order, fecretary of the fupreme council of ftate, and his minister plenipotentiary to the king of Great Britain ; who having communicated to each other their respective full powers, prepared in due form, have agreed upon the following articles.

Art. I. His Britannic majefty's fubjects, and the other colonifts who have hitherto enjoyed the protection of England, fhall evacuate the country of the Mofquitos, as well as the continent in general, and the islands adjacent, without exception, futuated beyond the line hercinafter deferibed, as what ought to be the froatier of the extent of territory granted by his catholic majefty to the English, for the uses specified in the third article of the prefent convention, and in addition to the country already granted to them in virtue of the flipulations agreed upon by the commiffaries of the two crowns in 1783.

Art. II. The catholic king, to prove, on his fide, to the king of Great Britain, the incerity of his fentiments of friendfhip towards his faid majerly and the Britifh nation, will grant to the Englifh more extenfive limits than those specified in the laft treaty of peace; and the faid limits of the lands added by the prefent convention shall for the tuture be understood in the manner following.

The English line, beginning from the fea, shall take the centre of the river Sibun or Jabon, and continue up to the fource of the faid river; from thence it shall cross in a strait line the intermediate land, till it interfects the river Wallis; and by the centre of the fame river; the faid line shall descend to the point where it will meet the line already fettled and marked out by the commissaries of the two crowns in 1783: which limits, following the continuation of the faid line, fhall be obferved as formerly flipulated by the definitive treaty.

Art. III. Although no other advantages have hitherto been in queftion, except that of cutting wood for dying, yet his catholic majefty, as a greater proof of his difpofition to oblige the king of Great Britain, will grant to the Englift the liberty of cutting all other wood, without even excepting mahogany, as well as gathering all the fruits, or produce of the earth, purely natural and uncultivated, which may, befides being carried away in their natural flate, become an object of utility or of commerce, whether for food or for manufactures : but it is expressly agreed, that this flipulation is never to be used as a pretext for establishing in that country any plantation of fugar, coffee, cacao, or other like articles, or any fabric or manufacture, by means of mills or other machines whatfoever (this reftriction however does not regard the use of faw mills for cutting or otherwife preparing the wood), fince all the lands in queition being indifputably acknowledged to belong of right to the crown of Spain, no fettlements of that kind, or the population which would follow, could be allowed.

The English shall be permitted to transport and convey all fuch wood, and other produce of the place, in its natural and uncultivated flate, down the rivers to the fea, but without ever going beyond the limits which are preferibed to them by the flipulations above granted, and without thereby taking an opportunity of afcending the faid rivers beyond their bounds, into the countries belonging to Spain.

Art. IV. The English shall be permitted to occupy the finall island known by the names of Cafina, St. George's Key, or Cayo Calina, in confideration of the circumstance of that part of the coafts opposite to the faid ifland being looked upon as fubject to dangerous diforders ; but this permiffion is only to be made ufe of for purpofes of real utility: and as great abufes, no lefs contrary to the intentions of the British government than the effential interefts of Spain, might arife from this permiffion, it is here flipulated, as an indifpenfable condition, that no fortification, or work of defence whatever, shall at any time be erected there, nor any body of troops pofed, nor any piece of artillery kept there; and in order to verify with good faith the accomplifument of this condition fine qua non (which might be infringed by individuals, without the knowledge of the Britifh government) a Spanifh officer or commiffary, accompanied by an Englifh commiffary or officer, duly authorized, fhall be admitted, twice a year, to examine into the real fituation of things.

Art. V. The English nation shall cojoy the liberty of refitting their merchant fhips in the fouthern triangle included between the Point of Cavo Cafina, and the clufter of fmall iflands which are fituated oppofite that part of the coaft occupied by the cutters, at the diftance of eight leagues from the river Wallis, feven from Cayo Cafina, and three from the river Sibun, a place which has always been found well adapted to that purpose. For which end, the edifices and florehouses abfolutely necessary for that fervice shall be allowed to be built; but in this concession is also included the exprefs condition of not erecting fortifications there at any time, or ftationing troops, or conftructing any military works; and in like manner it shall not be permitted to station any ships of war there, or to construct an arfenal, or other building, the object of which might be the formation of a naval establishment.

Art. VI. It is alfo ftipulated, that the Englifh may freely and peaceably catch fifh on the coaft of the country affigned to them by the laft treaty of peace, as alfo of that which is added to them by the prefent convention; but without going beyond their boundaries, and confining them felves felves within the diftance specified in the preceding article.

Art. VII. All the reftrictions specified in the last treaty of 1783, for the entire prefervation of the right of the Spanish sovereignty over the country, in which is granted to the English only the privilege of making use of the wood of the different kinds, the fruits and other produce, in their natural state, are here confirmed; and the fame restrictions shall also be observed with refpect to the new grant. In confequence, the inhabitants of those countries shall employ themselves fimply in the cutting and transporting of the faid wood, and in the gathering and transporting of the fruits, without meditating any more extensive settlements, or the formation of any fystem of government, either military or civil, further than fuch regulations as their Britannic and catholic majefties may hereafter judge proper to establish, for maintaining peace and goodorder amongst their respective subjects.

Art. VIII. As it is generally allowed that the woods and forefts are preferved, and even multiply, by regular and methodical cuttings, the Englith fhall obferve this maxim, as far as poffible; but if, notwithitanding all their precautions, it fhould happen in courie of time that they were in want of dyingwood, or mahogany, with which the Spanish poffeffions might be provided, the Spanish government shall make no difficulty to furnish a fupply to the English, at a fair and reationable price.

Art. IX. Every poffible precaution shall be observed to prevent fmuggling; and the English shall take care to conform to the regulalations which the Spanish government fhall think proper to eftablifh amongft their own fubjects, in all communications which they may have with the latter; on condition neverthelefs that the Englifh fhall be left in the peaceable enjoyment of the feveral advantages inferted in their favour in the laft treaty, or flipulated by the prefent convention.

Art. X. The Spanish governors shall be ordered to give to the faid English disperfed, all possible facilities for their removal to the fettlements agreed upon by the prefent convention, according to the stipulations of the 6th article of the definitive treaty of 1783, with respect to the country allotted for their use by the faid article.

Art. XI. Their Britannic and Catholic majeflies, in order to remove every kind of doubt with regard to the true confiruction of the prefent convention, think it neceffary to declare that the conditions of the faid convention ought to be obferved according to their fincere intention to enfure and improve the harmony and good underflanding, which fo happily fubfift at prefent between their faid majeflies.

In this view, his Britannic majefty engages to give the most pofitive orders for the evacuation of the countries above mentioned, by all his fubjects of whatever denomination; but if, contrary to fuch declaration, there should still remain any perfons fo daring as to prefume, by retiring into the interior country, to endeavour to obflruct the entire evacuation already agreed upon, his Britannic majefty, fo far from affording them the leaft fuccour, or even protection, will difavow them in the most folemu manner, manner, as he will equally do those who may hereafter attempt to fettle upon the territory belonging to the Spanish dominion.

Art. XII. The evacuation agreed upon shall be completely effected within the space of fix months after the exchange of the ratifications of this convention, or sooner, if it can be done.

Art. XIII. It is agreed that the new grants deferibed in the preceding articles, in favour of the English nation, are to take place as foon as the aforefaid evacuation fhall be entirely accomplifhed.

Art. XIV. His catholic majefly. prompted folely by motives of humanity, promifes to the king of England, that he will not exercise any aco of feverity against the Mofquitos, inhabiting in part the countries which are to be evacuated by virtue of the prefent convention, on account of the connections which may have fubfifted between the faid Indians and the English : and his Britannic majefty, on his part, will firictly prohibit all his fubjects from furnishing arms, or warlike stores, to the Indians in general, fituated upon the frontiers of the Spanish poffeffions.

Art. XV. The two courts fhall mutually transmit to each other duplicates of the orders, which they are to dispatch to their respective governors and commanders in America, for the accomplishment of the prefent convention; and a frigate, or proper ship of war, shall be appointed, on each fide, to observe in conjunction that all things are performed in the best order possible, and with that cordiality and good faith of which the two fovereigns have been pleafed to fet the example.

Art. XVI. The prefent convention fhall be ratified by their Britannic and catholic majefties, and the ratifications exchanged, within the fpace of fix weeks, or fooner, if it can be done.

In witnefs whereof, We, the underfigned ministers plenipotentiary of their Britannic and catholic majefties, in virtue of our respective full powers, have figned the prefent convention, and have affixed thereto the seals of our arms. (Signed)

Treaty of Commerce and Navigation, between his Britannic Majefty and the Most Christian King, signed at Versailles, the 26th of September, 1786.

TIS Britannic majefty, and his Moft Christian majesty, being equally animated with the defire not only of confolidating the good harmony which actually fubfifts between them, but alfo of extending the happy effects thereof to their respective subjects, have thought that the most efficacious means for attaining those objects, conformably to the 18th article of the treaty of peace, figned the 6th of September, 1783, would be to adopt a fystem of commerce on the bafis of reciprocity and mutual convenience, which, by difcontinuing the prohibitions and prohibitory duties which have existed for almost a century between the two nations, might procure the most folid advantages, on both fides, to the national productions and industry, and put an end to contraband trade, no lefs injurious to the public revenue, than to that lawful commerce which is alone entitled entitled to protection ; for this end, their faid majefties have named for their commiffaries and plenipotentiaries, to wit, the king of Great Britain, William Eden, esq. privy counfellor in Great Britain and Ireland, member of the British parliament, and his envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to his Most Christian majesty; and the Moft Chriftian king, the Sieur Jofeph Mathias Gerrard de Rayneval, knight, counfellor of state, knight of the royal order of Charles III. who, after having exchanged their respective full powers, have agreed upon the following articles:

Art. 11. For the future fecurity of commerce and friendship between the fubjects of their faid majesties, and to the end that this good correspondence may be preserved from all interruption and disturbance, it is concluded and agreed, that if, at any time, there should arise any mifunderstanding, breach of friendship, or rupture between the crowns of their majesties, which God forbid ! (which rupture shall not be deemed to exist until the recalling or fending home of the respective ambassadors and ministers) the fubjects of each of the two parties refiding in the dominions of the other, shall have the privilege of remaining and continuing their trade therein, without any manner of disturbance, fo long as they behave peaceably, and commit no offence against the laws and ordinances; and in cafe their conduct should render them fufpected, and the refpective governments should be obliged to order them to remove, the term of twelve months shall be allowed them for that purpose, in order that they may remove, with their effects and property, whether entrusted to individuals, or to the flate. At the fame time it is to be underflood, that this favour is not to be extended to those who shall act contrary to the establithed laws.

To which end, as often as it is required by either party, strict and express prohibitions shall be renewed and pub-Lihed Ethed in all the territories, countries, and dominions of each party wherefoever, that no one shall in any whe use such committions or letters of reprifal, under the fevereft puwhilement that can be inflicted on the tranigreffors, befides being liable to mate fall reflitution and fatisfaction to those to whom they have done any damage; neither fhall any letters of reprifal be hereafter granted by either of the faid high contracting parties, to the prejudice or detriment of the fubjects of the other, except only in fuch cafe wherein juffice is denied or delayed; which denial or delay of justice shall not be regarded as verified, unlefs the petitions of the perfon, who defires the faid letters of reprifal, be communicated to the minister refiding there on the part of the prince against whole fubjects they are not to be granted, that within the fpace of four months, or fooner, if it be poffible, he may manifest the contrary, or procure the fatisfaction which may be juitly due.

Art. IV. The fubjects and inhabitants of the respective dominions of the two fovereigns shall have liberty, freely and lecurely, without licence or paffport, general or fpecial, by land or by fea, or any other way, to enter into the kingdoms, dominions, provinces, countries, illands, cities, villages, towns, walled or unwalled, fortified or unfortified, ports, or territories whatfoever, of either fovereign, fituated in Europe, and to return from thence, to remain there, or to pals through the fame, and therein to buy and purchale, as they pleafe, all things necaffary for their fubfillence and ufe, and they shall mutually be treated with all kindnets and favour. They may likewife deposit and keep in their magazines and warehoufes the merchandizes brought from other parts, and afterwards expose the fame to fale, without being in any wife obliged, unless willingly and of their own accord, to bring the faid merchandizes to the marts and fairs. Neither are they to be burthened with any impositions or duties on account of the faid freedom of trade, or for any other caufe whatfoever, except those which are to be paid for their fhips and merchandizes, conformably to the regulations of the prefent treaty, or those to which the fubjects of the two contracting parties shall themselves be liable. And they fhall have free leave to remove move themfelves, as also their wives, children, and fervants, together with their merchandizes, property, goods, or effects, whether bought or imported, wherever they fhall think fit, out of either kingdom, by land and by fea, on the rivers and fresh waters, after difcharging the ufual duties; any law, privilege, grant, immunities, or cuffoms, to the contrary thereof in any wife notwithftanding. In matters of religion, the fubjects of the two crowns shall enjoy perfect liberty. They fhall not be compelled to attend divine fervice, whether in the churches or elfewhere; but, on the contrary, they shall be permitted, without any moleitation, to perform the exercises of their religion privately in their own houses, and in their own way. Liberty shall not be refused to bury the fubjects of either kingdom who die in the territories of the other, in convenient places to be appointed for that purpose; nor shall the funerals or fepulchres of the decealed be in any wife disturbed. The laws and flatutes of each kingdom shall remain in full force and vigour, and thall be duly put in execution, whether they relate to commerce and navigation, or to any other right, those cafes only excepted, concerning which it is otherwife determined in the articles of this prefent treaty. Art. VI. The two high contract-

Art. VI. The two high contracting parties have thought proper to fettle the duties on certain goods and merchandizes, in order to fix invariably the footing on which the trade therein fhall be established between the two nations. In confequence of which they have agreed upon the following tariff, viz.

1st. The wines of France, imported directly from France into Great Britain, fhall, in no cafe, pay any higher duties than those which the wines of Portugal now pay.

The wines of France, imported directly from France into Ireland, fhall pay no higher duties than those which they now pay.

2d. The vinegars of France, inflead of fixty-leven pounds five fhillings and three pence and twelve twentieths of a penny flerling, per ton, which they now pay, fhall not for the future pay, in Great Britain, any higher duties than thirty-two pounds eighteen fhillings and ten pence and fixteen twentieths of a penny flering, per ton.

3d. The brandies of France, inflead of nine faillings and fix pence and twelve twentieths of a penny fterling, fhall for the future pay, in Great Britain, only feven faillings flerling per gallon, making four quarts, English measure.

4th. Oil of olives, coming directly from France, shall, for the future, pay no higher duties than are now paid for the fame from the most favoured nations.

5th. Beer fhall pay reciprocally a duty of thirty per cent. ad valorem.

6th. The duties on hardware, catlery, cabinet ware, and tarnery, and alfo all works, both heavy and light, of iron, fieel, copper, and brats, fault be claffed; and the higheft daty fhall not exceed ten per cent. al valorem.

7th All forts of cettons manufactured in the dominions of the two fovereigns in Europe, and allo woollens, whether knit or wove, including hofiery, shall pay, in both countries, an import daty of twelve per cent. ad valorem; all manufactures 270] ANNUAL REGISTER, 1786.

8th. Cambricks and lawns fhall pay, in both countries, an import duty of five fhillings, or fix livres Tournois, per demi piece of feven yards and three quarters, Englifh meafure; and linens, made of flax or hemp, manufactured in the dominions of the two fovereigns in Europe, fhall pay no higher duties, either in Great Britain or France, than linens manufactured in Holland or Flanders, imported into Great Britain, now pay.

And linen made of flax or hemp, manufactured in Ireland or France, thall reciprocally pay no higher duties than linens manufactured in Holland, imported into Ireland, now pay.

9th. Sadlery shall reciprocally pay an import duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

10th. Gauzes of all forts fhall reciprocally pay ten per cent. ad valorem.

11th. Millinery made up of muflin, lawn, cambrick, or gauze of every kind, or of any other article admitted under the prefent tariff, fhall pay reciprocally a duty of twelve per cent. ad valorem: and if any articles fhall be ufed therein, which are not fpecified in the tariff, they fhall pay no higher duties than those paid for the fame articles by the most favoured nations.

12th. Porcelain, earthen-ware, and pottery, shall pay reciprocally twelve per cent. ad valorem.

13th. Plate-glass and glass ware in general shall be admitted, on each fide, paying a duty of twelve per cent. ad valorem.

His Britannic majesty referves the right of countervailing, by additional duties on the undermentioned merchandizes, the internal duties actually imposed upon the manufactures, or the import duties which are charged on the raw materials; namely, on all linens or cottons, flained or printed, on beer, glass ware, plate glass, and iron.

And his Most Christian majesty also referves the right of doing the fame, with regard to the following merchandizes; namely, cottons, iron, and beer.

And for the better fecuring the due collection of the duties payable ad valorem, which are fpecified in the above tariff, the faid contracting parties will concert with each other as well the form of the declarations to be made, as alfo the proper means of preventing fraud with refpect to the real value of the faid goods and merchandizes.

But if it shall hereafter appear, that any millakes have inadvertently been made in the above tariff, contrary to the principles on which it is founded, the two fovereigns will concert with good faith upon the means of rectifying them.

Art. VII. The duties above fpecified are not to be altered but by mutual confent; and the merchandizes not above specified shall pay, in the dominions of the two fovereigns, the import and export duties payable in each of the faid dominions by the most favoured European nations, at the time the prefent treaty bears date; and the fhips belonging to the fubjects of the faid dominions shall also respectively enjoy therein all the privileges and advantages which are granted to those of the most favoured European nations.

And it being the intention of the two high contracting parties, that their

their respective subjects should be in the dominions of each other upon a footing as advantageous as those of other European nations, they agree, that in cafe they shall hereafter grant any additional advantages in navigation or trade to any other European nations, they will reciprocally allow their faid fubjects to participate therein; without prejudice, however, to the advantages which they referve, viz. France in favour of Spain, in confequence of the 24th article of the Family Compact, figned the 10th of May, 1761, and England according to what the has practifed in conformity to, and in confequence of the convention of 1703, between England and Portugal.

And to the end that every perfon may know, with certainty, the ftate of the aforefaid imposts, cuftoms, import and export duties, whatever they may be, it is agreed, that tariffs, indicating the imposts, cuftoms, and eftablished duties, shall be affixed in public places, as well in Rouën and the other trading cities of France, as in London and the other trading cities under the dominion of the king of Great Britain, that recourfe may be had to them whenever any difference shall arife concerning fuch imposts, cuftoms, and duties, which finall not be levied otherwife than in conformity to what is clearly expressed in the faid tariffs, and according to their natural construction. And if any officer, or other perfon in his name, fhall, under any pretence, publicly or privately, directly or indirectly, demand or take of a merchant, or of any other perion, any fum of money, or any thing elfe, on account of duties, impoft, fearch, or compensation, although it be under the name of a free gift, or under any other pretence, more or otherwife than what is above preferibed; in fuch cafe the faid officer, or his deputy, if he be accufed and convicted of the fame before a competent judge, in the place where the crime was committed, fhall give full fatisfaction to the injured party, and fhall likewife fuffer the penalty preferibed by the laws.

Art. VIII. No merchandize exported from the countries refpectively under the dominion of their majefties, fhall hereafter be fubject to be infpected or conflicated, under any pretence of fraud or defect in making or working them, or of any other imperfection whatfoever; but abfelute freedom fhall be allowed to the buyer and feller to bargain and fix the price for the fame, as they fhall fee good; any law, ftatute, edict, proclamation, privilege, grant, or cuffom to the contrary notwithftanding.

Art. IX. Whereas feveral kinds of merchandizes, which are ufually contained in cafks, chefts, or other cafes, and for which the duties are paid by weight, will be exported from and imported into France by British fubjects; it is agreed, that in fuch cafe, the aforefaid duties thall be demanded only according .o the real weight of the merchandizes; and the weight of the cafks, chefts, and other cafes whatever, fhall be deducted, in the fame manner as has been, and is now practifed in England.

Art. X. It is further agreed, that if any millake or error thall be committed by any matter of a flip, his interpreter or factor, or by any other employed by him, in making the entry or declaration of her cargo, neither the flip nor the cargo fhall ihall be fubject, for fuch defect, to confifcation ; but it fhall be lawful for proprietors to take back again fuch goods as were omitted in the entry or declaration of the mafter of the fhip, paying only the accuftomed duties according to the placart, provided always that there be no manifest appearance of fraud: neither shall the merchants or the maîters of fhips, or the merchandize, be fubject to any penalty, by reason of fu h omission, in case the goods omitted in the declaration shall not have been landed before the delaration has been made.

Art. XI. In cafe either of the two high contracting parties shall think proper to establish prohibitions, or to augment the import duties upon any goods or merchandize of the growth or manufacture of the other, which are not fpecified in the tariff, fuch prohibitions or augmentations fhall be general, and fhall comprehend the like goods and merchandizes of the other most favoured European nations, as well as those of either flate; and in cafe either of he two contracting parties shall revoke the prohibitions, or diminifh the duties in favour of any other European nation, upon any goods or merchandize of its growth or manufacture, whether on importation or exportation, fuch revocations or diminutions shall be extended to the subjects of the other party, on condition that the latter shall grant to the fubjects of the former the importation and exportation of the like goods and merchandizes under the fame duties; the cafes referved in the VIIth article of the prefent treaty always excepted.

Art. XII. And forafmuch as a certain ulage, not authorized by any law, has formerly obtained in divers parts of Great Britain and France, by which French fubjects have paid in England a kind of capitation tax, called in the language of that country, head-money; and English fubjects a like duty in France, called argent du chef; it is agreed that the faid import fhall not be demanded for the future, on either fide, neither under the ancient name, nor under any other name what6ever.

Art. XIII. If either of the high contracting parties has granted, or shall grant, any bounties for encouraging the exportation of any articles, being of the growth, produce, or manufacture of his dominions, the other party shall be allowed to add to the duties already imposed, by virtue of the present treaty, on the faid goods and merchandizes, imported into his dominions, fuch an import duty as shall be equivalent to the faid bounty. But this flipulation is not to extend to the cafes of reflitutions of duties and imposts (called drawbacks), which are allowed upon exportation.

Art. XIV. The advantages granted by the prefent treaty to the fubjects of his Britannic majefty fhall take effect, as far as relates to the kingdom of Great Britain, as foon as laws fhall be paffed there for fecuring to the fubjects of his Moff Chriftian majefty the reciprocal enjoyment of the advantages which are granted to them by the prefent treaty.

And the advantages granted by all thefe articles, except the tariff, fhall take effect, with regard to the kingdom of Ireland, as foon as laws fhall be paffed there for fecuring to the fubjects of his Moft Chriftian majefty the reciprocal enjoyment of the advantages which are granted to

to them by this treaty; and, in like manner, the advantages granted by the tariff shall take effect, in what relates to the faid kingdom, as foon as laws shall be passed there for giving effect to the faid tariff.

Art. XV. It is agreed, that ships belonging to his Britannic majefty's fubjects, arriving in the dominious of his Moft Christian majefty, from the port of Great Britain or Ireland, or from any other foreign port, shall not pay freight duty or any other like duty. In the fame manner, French ships shall be ex-empted in the dominions of his Britannic majelty, from the duty of five shillings, and from every other fimilar duty or charge.

XVI. It shall not be lawful for any foreign privateers, not being fubjects of either crown, who have commissions from any other prince or state, in enmity with either nation, to arm their thips in the ports of either of the faid two kingdoms, to fell what they have taken, or in any other manner whatever to exchange the fame; neither fhall they be allowed even to purchase victuals, except fuch as shall be necessary for their going to the nearest port of that prince from whom they have obtained commissions.

Art. XVII. When any difpute shall arife between any commander of a thip and his feamen, in the ports of either kingdom, concerning wages due to the faid feamen, or other civil caufes whatever, the magistrate of the place shall require no more from the perfon accufed, than that he give to the accufer a declaration in writing, witneffed by the magistrate, whereby he shall be bound to answer that matter before a competent judge in his own country; which being done, it shall not be lawful for the feamen to defert their ship, or to hinder the commander from profecuting his voyage. It shall moreover be lawful for the merchants in the places of their abode, or elsewhere, to keep books of their accounts and affairs, as they shall fee fit, and to have an intercourfe of letters, in fuch language or idiom as they fhall chufe, without any moleftation or fearch whatfoever. But if it fhould happen to be neceffary for them to produce their books of accounts for deciding any dispute or controverfy, in fuch cafe they shall be obliged to bring into court the entire books or writings, but fo as the judge may not have liberty to take cognizance of any other articles in the faid books than fuch as shall relate to the affair in question, or fuch as shall be necessary to give credit to the faid books; neither fhall it be lawful, under any pretence, to take the faid books or writings forcibly out of the hands of the owners, or to retain them, the cafe of bankruptcy only excepted. Nor shall the subjects of the king of Great Britain be obliged to write their accounts, letters, or other instruments relating to trade, on stamped paper, except their daybook, which, that it may be produced as evidence in any law-fuit, ought, according to the laws which all perfons trading in France are to observe, to be indorsed and attested gratis by the judge, under his ownhand.

Art. XVIII. It is further agreed and concluded, that all merchants, commanders of fhips, and others, the fubjects of the king of Great Britain, in all the dominions of his Most Christian majesty in Europe. fhall have full liberty to manage [S]their their own affairs themfelves, or to commit them to the management of whomfoever they pleafe; nor fhall they be obliged to employ any interpreter or broker, nor to pay them any falary, unleis they fhall chufe to employ them. Moreover, mafters of thips thall not be obliged, in loading or unloading their ships, to make use of those perions who may be appointed by public authority for that purpose, either at Bourdeaux or elsewhere; but it shall be entirely free for them to load or unload their thips by themfelves, or to make use of such perfon or perfons in loading or unloading the fame, as they fhall think fit, without the payment of any reward to any other whomfoever; neither shall they be forced to unload into other fhips, or to receive into their own, any merchandize whatever, or to wait for their lading any longer than they pleafe. And all the fubjects of the Most Christian king fhall reciprocally have and enjoy the fame privileges and liberties, in all the dominions of his Britannic majesty in Europe.

Art. XIX. The hips of either party being laden, failing along the coafts of the other, and being forced by form into the havens or ports, or making land there in any other manner whatever, fhall not be obliged to unlade their goods, or any part thereof, or to pay any duty, unlefs they, of their own accord, unlade their goods there, and fell fome part thereof. But it shall be lawful, permifion having been first obtained from those who have the direction of maritime affairs, to unlade and fell a fmall part of their cargo, merely for the end of purchafing neceffaries, either for victualling or refitting the flip; and in that cafe the whole lading fhall not be fubject to pay the duties, but that fmall part only which fhall have been taken out and fold.

Art. XX. It shall be lawful for all the fubjects of the king of Great Britain, and of the Moft Christian king, to fail with their fhips, with perfect fecurity and liberty, no diftinction being made who are the proprietors of the merchandizes laden thereon, from any port whatever, to the countries which are now, or shall be hereafter at war with the king of Great Britain, or the Mott Christian king. It shall likewife be lawful for the aforefaid fubjects to fail and traffic with their fhips and merchandizes, with the fame liberty and fecurity, from the countries, ports, and places of those who are enemies of both, or of either party, without any opposition or diffurbance whatfoever, and to pafs directly not only from the places of the enemy aforementioned to neutral places, but also from one place belonging to an enemy to another place belonging to an enemy, whether they be under the jurifdiction of the fame, or of feveral princes. And as it has been ftipulated concerning fhips and goods, that every thing shall be deemed free, which fhall be found on board the fhips belonging to the fubjects of the respective kingdoms, although the whole lading, or part thereof, should belong to the enemies of their majesties, contraband goods being always excepted, on the stopping of which fuch proceedings shall be had as are conformable to the fpirit of the following articles; it is likewife agreed, that the fame liberty be extended to perfons who are on board a free ship, to the end that, although though they be enemies to both, or to either party, they may not be taken out of such free ships, unless they are foldiers, actually in the fervice of the enemies, and on their voyage for the purpole of being employed in a military capacity, in their fleets or armies.

Art. XXI. This liberty of navigation and commerce fhall extend to all kinds of merchandizes, excepting those only which are specified in the following article, and which are defcribed under the name of contraband.

Art. XXII. Under this name of contraband, or prohibited goods, shall be comprehended arms, cannon, harquebusses, mortars, petards, bombs, grenades, fauciffes, carcafies, carriages for cannon, musket-rest, bandoleers, gunpowder, match, faltpetre, ball, pikes, swords, headpieces, helmets, cutlasfes, halberds, javelins, holtsters, belts, horses and harnefs, and all other like kinds of arms and warlike implements fit for the use of troops.

Art. XXIII. Thefe merchandizes which follow fhall not be reckoned among contraband goods, that is to fay; all forts of cloth, and all other manufactures of wool, flax, filk, cotton, or any other materials, all kinds of wearing apparel, together with the articles of which they are ufually made, gold, filver, coined or uncoined, tin, iron, lead, copper, brafs, coals, as alfo wheat and barley, and any other kind of corn and pulfe, tobacco, and all kinds of fpices, falted and fmoaked flefh, falted fifh, cheefe and butter, beer, oil, wines, fugar, all forts of falt, and of provisions which ferve for fustenance and food to mankind ; alfo all kinds of cotton, cordage, cables, fails, failcloth, hemp, tallow, pitch, tar, and rofin, anchors and any parts of anchors, ship masts, planks, timber of all kinds of trees. and all other things proper either for building or repairing thips. Nor shall any other goods whatever, which have not been worked into the form of any inftrument, or furniture for warlike ufe, by land or by fea, be reputed contraband, much lefs fuch as have been already wrought and made up for any other purpofe. All which things shall be deemed goods not contraband, as likewife all others which are not comprehended and particularly dcfcribed in the preceding article; fo that they may be freely carried by the fubjects of both kingdoms, even to places belonging to an enemy, excepting only fuch places as are befieged, blocked up, or invefted.

Art. XXIV To the end that all manner of diffentions and quarrels may be avoided and prevented on both fides, it is agreed, that in cafe either of their majefties should be engaged in a war, the fhips and veffels belonging to the jubjects of the other shall be furnished with fea-letters or paffports, expressing the name, property, and bulk of the fhip, as alfo the name and place of abode of the master or commander of the faid fhip, that it may appear thereby that the ship really and truly belongs to the fubjects of one of the princes ; which paffports shall be made out and granted, according to the form annexed to the prefent treaty: they shall likewife be renewed every year, if the ship happens to return home within the fpace of a year. It is also agreed, that fuch ships when laden are to be provided not only with paffports as above mentioned, but also with certificates containing the feveral par- $[S]_2$ ticulars ticulars of the cargo, the place from whence the fhip failed, and whither fhe is bound, fo that it may be known whether fhe carries any of the prohibited or contraband goods fpecified in the XXIId article of this treaty; which certificates fhall be prepared by the officers of the place from whence the fhip fet fail, in the accuftomed form. And if any one fhall think fit to express in the faid certificates the perfon to whom the goods belong, he may freely do fo.

Art. XXV. The fhips belonging to the fubjects and inhabitants of the refpective kingdoms, coming to any of the coafts of either of them, but without being willing to enter into port, or being entered, yet not willing to land their cargoes, or break bulk, fhall not be obliged to give an account of their lading, unlets they are fufpected, upon fure evidence, of carrying prohibited goods, called contraband, to the enemies of either of the two high contracting parties.

Art. XXVI. In cafe the ships belonging to the faid fubjects and inhabitants of the respective dominions of their most ferene majesties, either on the coaft or on the high feas, shall meet with any men of war belonging to their most ferene majesties, or with privatcers, the faid men of war and privateers, for preventing any inconveniencies, are to remain out of cannon shot, and to fend their boats to the merchantfhip which may be met with, and fhall enter her to the number of two or three men only, to whom the master or commander of fuch ship or veffel fhall fhew his paffport, containing the proof of the property of the ship, made out according to the form annexed to this prefent treaty; and the fhip which fhall have exhibited the fame fhall have hberty to continue her voyage, and it fhall be wholly unlawful any way to moleft or fearch her, or to chafe or compel her to alter her courfe.

Art. XXVII. The merchant-fhips belonging to the fubjects of either of the two high contracting parties, which intend to go to a port at enmity with the other fovereign, concerning whofe voyage and the fort of goods on board there may be juft caufe of fufpicion, fhall be obliged to exhibit, as well on the high feas as in the ports and havens, not only her paffports, but alfo her certificates, exprefing that the goods are not of the kind which are contraband, as fpecified in the XXIId article of this treaty.

Art. XXVIII. If, on exhibiting the above-mentioned certificates, containing a lift of the cargo, the other party should discover any goods of that kind which are declared contraband, or prohibited, by the XXIId article of this treaty, and which are defigned for a port fubject to his enemies, it shall be unlawful to break up or open the hatches, chefts, cafks, bales, or other veffels found on board fuch fhip, or to remove even the fmallest parcel of the goods, whether the faid ship belongs to the fubjects of the king of Great Britain, or of the Moft Chriftian king, unless the lading be brought on thore, in the prefence of . the officers of the court of admiralty, and an inventory made by them of the faid goods: nor fhall it be lawful to fell, exchange, or alienste the fame in any manner, unlefs after due and lawful process shall have been had against fuch prohibited goods, and the judges of the admiralty admiralty respectively shall, by fentence pronounced, have confifcated the fame; faving always as well the ship itself, as the other goods found therein, which by this treaty are to be accounted free : neither may they be detained on pretence of their being mixed with prohibited goods, much lefs fhall they be confifcated as lawful prize : and if, when only part of the cargo shall confist of contraband goods, the master of the thip thall agree, confent, and offer to deliver them to the captor who has difcovered them, in fuch cafe, the captor having received those goods as lawful prize, shall forthwith release the ship, and not hinder her, by any means, from profecuting her voyage to the place of her deffination.

Art. XXIX. On the contrary it is agreed, that whatever shall be found to be laden by the fubjects and inhabitants of either party, on any ship belonging to the enemies of the other, although it be not contraband goods, shall be conficated in the fame manner as if it belonged to the enemy himfelf; except those goods and merchandizes which were put on board fuch ship before the declaration of war, or the general order for reprifals, or even after fuch declaration, if it were done within the times following; that is to fay, if they were put on board fuch ship in any port or place within the space of two months after such declaration or order for reprifals, between Archangel, St. Peteriburgh, and the Scilly islands, and between the faid islands and the city of Gibraltar; of ten weeks in the Mediterranean fea; and of eight months in any other country or place in the world; fo that the goods of the fubjects of either prince, whether they be contraband, or otherwife, which, as aforefaid, were put on board any fhip belonging to an enemy before the war, or after the declaration of the fame, within the time and limits above-mentioned, fhall no ways be liable to confifcation, but fhall well and truly be reftored, without delay, to the proprietors demanding the fame; provided neverthelefs, that if the faid merchandizes be contraband, it shall not be any ways lawful to carry them afterwards to the ports belonging to the enemy. Art. XXX. And that more abundant care may be taken for the fecurity of the respective subjects of their most ferene majellies, to prevent their fuffering any injury by the men of war or privateers of either party, all the commanders of the ships of the king of Great Britain, and of the Moft Christian king, and all their subjects, shall be forbid doing any damage to those of the other party, or committing any outrage against them; and if they act to the contrary they shall be punished, and thall moreover be bound, in their perfons and estates, to make fatisfaction and reparation for all damages, and the interest thereof, of what nature foever.

Art. XXXI. For this caufe, all commanders of privateers, before they receive their patents or special commissions, shall hereafter be obliged to give, before a competent judge, fufficient fecurity by good bail, who are refponsible men, and have no interest in the faid ship, each of whom shall be bound in the whole for the fum of thirty-fix thoafand livres Tournois, or fifteen hundred pounds sterling; or if such fhip be provided with above one hundred and fifty feamen or foldiers, for for the fum of feventy-two thonfand livres Tournois, or three thoufand pounds fterling, that they will make entire fatisfaction for all damages and injuries whatfoever, which they, or their officers, or others in their fervice, may commit during their cruize, contrary to the tenor of this prefent treaty, or the edicts made in confequence thereof by their moft ferene majefiles, under penalty likewife of having their patents and fpecial commifions revoked and annulled.

Art. XXXII. Their faid majefties being willing mutually to treat in their dominions the fubjects of each other as favourably as if they were their own fubjects, will give fuch orders as fhall be neceffary and effectual, that the judgments and decrees concerning prizes in the courts of admiralty be given conformably to the rules of juffice and equity, and to the flipulations of this treaty, by judges who are above all fufpicion, and who have no manner of intereft in the caufe in difpute.

Art. XXXIII. And when the quality of the ship, goods, and mafter, shall fufficiently appear, from fuch paffports and certificates, it shall not be lawful for the commanders of men of war to exact any further proof under any pretext whatfoever. But if any merchantfhip fhall not be provided with fuch pailports or certificates, then it may be examined by a proper judge, but in fuch manner as, if it shall be found, from other proofs and documents, that it truly belongs to the fubjects of one of the fovereigns, and does not contain any contraband goods, defigned to be carried to the enemy of the other, it shall not be liable to confifcation, but fhall be releafed, together with its cargo, in order to proceed on its voyage.

If the master of the ship named in the passports should happen to die, or be removed by any other cause, and another put in his place, the ships and goods laden thereon shall nevertheless be equally secure, and the passports shall remain in full force.

Art. XXXIV. It is further provided and agreed, that the thips of either of the two nations, retaken by the privateers of the other, shall be reftored to the former owner, if they have not been in the power of the enemy for the fpace of four and twenty hours, fubject to the payment, by the faid owner, of one third of the value of the ship retaken, and of its cargo, guns, and apparel; which third part fhall be amicably adjusted by the parties concerned : but if not, and in cafe they fhould difagree, they fhall make application to the officers of the admiralty of the place where the privateer which retook the captured veffel shall have carried her.

If the fhip retaken has been in the power of the enemy above four and twenty hours, fhe fhall wholly belong to the privateer which retook her.

In cafe of a fhip being retaken by any man of war belonging to his Britannic majefty, or to his Moft Chriftian majefty, it fhall be reftored to the former owner, on payment of the thirtieth part of the value of fuch fhip, and of its cargo, guns, and apparel, if it was retaken within the four and twenty hours, and the tenth part if it was retaken after the four and twenty hours; which fums fhall be diffributed, as a reward, amongft the crews of the fhips ships which shall have retaken such prize. The valuation of the thirtieth and tenth parts above mentioned shall be settled conformably to the regulations in the beginning of this article.

Art. XXXV. Whenfoever the ambassadors of either of their faid majesties, or other their ministers having a public character, and refiding at the court of the other prince, shall complain of the injustice of the fentences which have been given, their majefties shall refpectively caufe the fame to be revifed and re-examined in their councils, unlefs their councils fhould already have decided thereupon, that it may appear, with certainty, whether the directions and provisions prefcribed in this treaty have been followed and obferved. Their majefties shall likewife take care that this matter be effectually provided for, and that juffice be done to every complainant within the fpace of three months. However, before or after judgment given, and pending the revision thereof, it shall not be lawful to fell the goods in dispute, or to unlade them, unlefs with the confent of the perfons concerned, for preventing any kind of los; and laws shall be enacted on both fides for the execution of the prefent artiçle.

Art. XXXVI. If any differences fhall arife refpecting the legality of prizes, fo that a judicial decifion thould become neceffary, the judge fhall direct the effects to be unladen, an inventory and appraifement to be made thereof, and fecurity to be required refpectively from the captor for paying the cofts, in cafe the fhip fhould not be declared lawful prize; and from the claimant for paying the value of the prize, in cafe it should be declared lawful: which fecurities being given by both parties, the prize shall be delivered up to the claimant. But if the claimant should refuse to give sufficient fecurity, the judge fhall direct the prize to be delivered to the captor, after having received from him good and fufficient fecurity for paying the full value of the faid prize, in cafe it should be adjudged illegal. Nor fhall the execution of the fentence of the judge be fuspended by reason of any appeal, when the party against whom fuch appeal shall be brought, whether claimant or captor, shall have given fufficient fecurity for reftoring the ship or effects, or the value of fuch thip or effects, to the appellant, in cafe judgment should be given in his favour.

Art. XXXVII. In cafe any fhips of war or merchantmen, forced by ftorms or other accidents, be driven on rocks or fhelves, on the coafts of either of the high contracting parties, and should there be dashed to pieces and shipwrecked, all such parts of the faid ships, or of the furniture or apparel thereof, as also of the goods and merchandizes as shall be faved, or the produce thereof, fhall be faithfully reflored, upon the fame being claimed by the proprietors, or their factors, duly authorized, paying only the expences incurred in the prefervation thereof, according to the rate of falvage fettled on both fides; faving at the fame time the rights and cuftoms of each nation, the abolition or modification of which shall however be treated upon, in the cafes where they shall be contrary to the stipulations of the prefent article; and their majefties will mutually interpofe their authority, that fuch of their fub-[8] 4 jects, jects, as shall be fo inhuman as to take advantage of any fuch misfortune, may be feverely punished.

Art. XXXVIII. It shall be free for the subjects of each party to employ such advocates, attornies, notaries, folicitors, and factors, as they shall think fit; to which end the faid advocates and others above mentioned, shall be appointed by the ordinary judges, if it be needful, and the judges be thereunto required.

XXXIX. Art. And for the greater fecurity and liberty of commerce and navigation, it is further agreed, that both the king of Great Britain, and the Most Christian king, thall not only refuse to receive any pirates or fea-rovers whatfoever into any of their havens, ports, cities, or towns, or permit any of their fubjects, citizens, or inhabitants, on either part, to receive or protect them in their ports, to harbour them in their houses, or to affift them in any manner whatfeever; but further they fhall caufe all fuch pitates and fea-rovers, and all perfons who fhall receive, conceal, or affind them, to be brought to condign punishment, for a terror and example to others. And all their fhips, with the goods or merchandizes taken by them, and brought into the ports of either kingdom, shall be feized as far as they can be difcovered, and shall be restored to the owners, or their factors duly authorized or deputed by them in writing, proper evidence being first given in the court of admiralty, for proving the property, even in cafe such effects thould have paffed into other hands by fale, if it be proved that the buyers knew, or might have known, that they had been piratically taken. And generally all fhips and merchandizes, of what nature foever, which may be taken on the high feas, fhall be brought into fome port of either kingdom, and delivered into the cuftody of the officers of that port, that they may be reflored entire to the true proprietor, as foon as due and fufficient proof fhall have been made concerning the property thereof.

Art. XL. It shall be lawful, as well for the ships of war of their majefties, as for privateers belonging to their fubjects, to carry whitherfoever they pleafe the ships and goods taken from their enemies, without being obliged to pay any fee to the officers of the admiralty, or to any judges whatever; nor fhall the faid prizes, when they arrive at and enter the ports of their faid majetties, be detained or feized ; neither shall the fearchers, or other officers of those places, vifit or take cognizance of the validity of fuch prizes; but they fhall be at liberty to hoift fail at any time, to depart, and to carry their prizes to the place mentioned in the commissions or patents, which the commanders of such fhips of war fhall be obliged to fhew : on the contrary, no fhelter or refuge fhall be given in their ports to fuch as have made prize upon the fubjects of either of their majefties; but if forced by ftrefs of weather, or the dangers of the fea, to enter therein, particular care shall be taken to hasten their departure, and to caufe them to retire from thence as foon as possible, as far as it is not repugnant to former treaties made in this respect with other sovereigns or flates.

Art. XLI. Neither of their faid majefties shall permit the ships or goods belonging to the subjects of the other to be taken within cannonshot fhot of the coaft, or in the ports or rivers of their dominions, by fhips of war, or others having commiffion from any prince, republic, or city, whatfoever: but in cafe it fhould fo happen, both parties fhall employ their united force to obtain reparation of the damage thereby occafioned.

Act. XLII. But if it shall appear that the captor made use of any kind of torture upon the master of the ship, the crew, or others who shall be on board any ship belonging to the fubjects of the other party, in fuch cafe, not only the ship itself, together with the perfons, merchandizes, and goods whatfoever, shall be forthwith releafed, without any delay, and fet entirely free, but alfo fuch as shall be convicted of fo enormous a crime, together with their accomplices, shall fuffer the most severe punishment suitable to their offences: this the king of Great Britain and the Most Chriftian king mutually engage shall be observed, without any respect of perfons whatfoever.

Art. XLIII. Their majefties shall refpectively be at liberty, for the advantage of their fubjects trading to the kingdoms and dominions of either of them, to appoint therein national confuls, who fhall enjoy the right, immunity, and liberty belonging to them, by reason of their duties and their functions: and places shall hereafter be agreed upon where the faid confuls shall be effablifhed, as well as the nature and extent of their functions. The convention relative to this point thall be concluded immediately after the fignature of the prefent treaty, of which it shall be deemed to conflitute a part.

Art. XLIV. It is alfo agreed, that in whatever relates to the lading and unlading of thips, the fafety of merchandize, goods, and effects, the fucceffion to perfonal effates, as well as the protection of individuals, and their perfonal liberty, as alfo the administration of juilice, the fubjects of the two high contracting parties thall enjoy in their refpective dominions the fame privileges, liberties, and rights, as the moft favoured nation.

Art. XLV. If hereafter it shall happen, through inadvertency or otherwife, that any infractions or contraventions of the prefent treaty fhould be committed on either fide, the friendship and good understanding fhall not immediately thereupon be interrupted; but this treaty shall fubilit in all its force, and proper remedies shall be procured for removing the inconveniencies, as likewife for the reparation of the contraventions: and if the subjects of either kingdom shall be found guilty thereof, they only shall be punished and feverely chaffifed.

Art. XLVI. His Britannic majefty and his Moft Chriftian majefty have referved the right of revising and re-examining the feveral flipulations of this treaty, after the term of twelve years, to be computed from the day of paffing laws for its execution in Great Britain and Ireland respectively, to propose and make fuch alterations as the times and circumstances may have rendered proper or neceffary for the commercial interests of their respective fubjects: and this revision is to be completed in the fpace of twelve months; after which term the prefent treaty shall be of no effect, but in that event the good harmony and friendly 2827 friendly correspondence between the two nations shall not fuffer the least diminution.

Art. XLVII. The prefent treaty fhall be ratified and confirmed by his Britannic majefty and by his Moft Chriftian majefty, in two months, or fooner, if it can be done, after the axchange of fignatures between the plenipotentiaries.

In witnefs whereof, we the underfigned commiffaries and plenipotentiaries of the king of Great Britain and the Moft Chriftian king, have figned the prefent treaty with our hands, and have fet thereto the feals of our arms.

The Prince of Orange's Letter to the States of the Province of Holland, fent September 26, 1786, in anfwer to their Notification of his Sufpenfion from the Office of Captain General.

Noble, great, and mighty lords, and particularly good friends.

T is with the utmost concern we have feen by the letter and refolution of your noble and great mightineffes, dated the 22d inftant, that you are pleafed to perfift provisionally, and without prejudice to the further deliberations of your noble and great mightineffes, in the various orders iffued out concerning the troops of that flate, by which they have been relieved, till further orders, from that part of the oath which bound them to our obedience as captain-general of Holland and Weft Friefland, but which orders your noble and great mightineffes did not think proper to impart to us in our aforefaid quality, whilft you fuspend provisionally the effect of your refolution of the 8th of March, 1766, which invefted invested us as captain-general of your province by efpecial delegation, with power to difpofe of all military employments, from the enfign to the colonel inclusively, ferving in the militia or troops within your jurifdiction.

We cannot but be fenfibly hurt at the aforefaid refolution, fince its effect is to deprive us of a right which has been allowed and fecured to us by the unanimous vote of all the members of the state, by appointing us captain-general hereditary of Holland and Weft Friefland. We might here claim the immediate effect of fuch a refolution, which as it had been entered into nem. con. cannot, fuppofing it to be revocable, be cancelled, or even fuspended, without the like unanimity. But what goes still nearer to our heart, and on which we cannot remain filent, is the motives you are pleafed to adduce in fupport of your last refolution, namely, that it has been taken with a view to obviate our influence as captain-generalover the faid troops, and the manner of directing them, . which is incompatible with the fafety of your province, and the measures adopted to secure it.

We might, without failing in what we owe to your noble and great mightineffes, and in as earneft a manner as besits' a matter of fuch high importance, that concerns our honour and good name, request you would be pleased to communicate to us the reafons of the mistrust your noble and great mightineffes entertain of our influence and direction of the provincial troops, and then you would find that we have it fufficiently in our power to convince your noble and great mightineffes how groundlefs

tain perfons, ill-disposed towards the country and ourfelves. But we are perfectly eafy and fecured that nothing can be alledged with truth against us, by which we should have deferved to forfeit the confidence of your noble and great mightineffes. And we can vouch before God, yourfelves, all the citizens of the Netherlands, nay, and before all the world, that in this regard our confcience is perfectly irreproachable, Under pleafure of your noble and great mightineffes, we cannot but declare, fince our honour, dearer to us than life, stands impeached, that we eannot remain under fuch a blame and stigma, resulting from the tokens of distrust given us by your noble and great mightineffes, and efpecially by your recent refolution, and it is a duty we owe to the race from whence we fpring, to the royal houfe to which we have the honour to be allied, to their high mightineffes, to the respective provinces to whole fervice we are bound by the employments we hold by hereditary right, and to ourfelves, in fine, to clear ourfelves from fuch an afperfion; that, confeious of our innocence, from any failure of our plighted faith to your noble and great mightineffes, as well as to the provinces of Holland and Weft Friefland, by the oath taken by us as stadtholder, governor, captaingeneral, and hereditary admiral of your province, when we undertook to act in those capacities; we are juftified in fuppofing that nothing pofitive hath been laid to our charge, and that all the steps taken against us are merely the refult of fome members of your affembly having too readily lent an ear to the reports of of perfons unworthy of their confidence, and whole fole aim is to abridge our lawful prerogatives, and those of our house, granted by your noble and great mightineffes, and enjoyed by the itadtholders and captain-generals our predeceffors, or even to bring about a total alteration in the lawful and established conflitution of those countries, entirely abolish the stadtholdership, or fo contrive it, that the above dignity should become completely uselefs to our dear country, and its good citizens. Mean while we referve to ourfelves the choice of fuch further measures for our justification as to us may feem beft.

Here we might conclude, did we not think it neceffary to proteft once more, that we never have done, or even attempted any thing that we justly might look upon as derogatory to the real concerns of the United Provinces in general, or in parti-cular to the flates of Holland and Weft Friefland; and that we defire nothing better than to be put to the teft of giving effectual proofs of the true love we bear to the country, having nothing more at heart than the profperity of the United Provinces, and especially that of the province under the jurifdiction of your noble and great mightineffes, wherein wewere born and brought up; and that our first and warmest wish is, to become, in the hands of the Almighty, a fit inftrument to contribute to the welfare of the country.

Wherefore, &c. (Signed) WILLIAM, Prince of Orange. September, 1786, by the Count de Geertz, his Majesty's Envoy Extraordinary.

W E, Frederic William, by the grace of God, king of Pruffia, marquis of Brandenburgh, &c. &c. to their High Mightineffes the States of the United Provinces of the Low Countries, with offers of friendfhip, and every good thing in our power.

High and mighty lords, particular good friends, and neighbours.

As it has pleafed Providence to call to himfelf our much honoured and loved uncle Frederic the Third, late king of Pruffia, by which we fucceed to the government of the eftates which he left, we have thought proper to fend to your high mightineffes, in quality of envoy extraordinary, our minister of state and grand-mafter of the wardrobe, the comte de Goertz, to give your high mightinesses a proof of our efteem, and that he may by word of mouth communicate to you how defirous we are to continue in that friendflip and harmony with the republic of the Seven United Provinces, which has been transmitted down to us by our ancestors for centuries; and alfo to demonstrate the warm part we take in the unhappy diffentions which have to long divided fome of the provinces, and particularly those which have arisen between fome of them and the stadtholder, prince of Orange and Naffau, and the very extraordinary oppressions which that prince is innocently obliged to fuffer. We will not detain your high mightiness with any ample detail on that fubject, as his highness the prince stadtholder has, in several different letters

The King of Pruffia's Letter to the States General of the United Prowinces, delivered on the 18th of ters to the states of Holland and Weit Friefland, explained in a very ample and convincing manner the hardness of taking from him his prerogatives; but we would rather refer to the letter fent by our predecessor on the 18th of September, 1785 *, as well to your high mightineffes as to the states of Holland and Weft Frieiland, the contents of which well-intentioned letter we ferioufly confirm and renew, repeating the amicable request contained in it, that the affairs of the prince fladtholder may be directed by fuch reciprocally agreeable means, that they may be re-established as soon as poflible upon their former footing, conformable to the conflictution, and By the prefent we the convention. request your high mightinessearneftly and amicably to employ your powerful interceffion, in the most ferious manner, with the states of Holland and West Friesland, and wherever elfe your high mightineffes may think proper, to put his ferene highnefs the prince stadtholder in a fituation (by means which are not difficult to be found out) to return with honour and propriety to the Hague, to take upon him his high employments; and that a durable termination be put to all the other differences, in a manner compatible with equity, and the honour and true interests of all parties, towards which we are willing to contribute, with other friends and neighbours of the republic, by our councils and mediation, in a manner both equitable and impartial. We have given instructions to the comte de Goertz to lay all this before your high mightineffes, and, if circumstances require it, before the flates of each particular province, in a most explicit manner, to assure on our part all that is necessary, and, if it be thought proper, to enter into negociations on the subject.

We defire your high mightineffes in confequence to place entire confidence in the comte de Goertz in this weighty affair, and to negociate and finish with him whatever may be thought agreeable to both parties, according to circumstances. We hope and truft that no fufpicions can arife in the minds of your high mightineffes, or those of the states of any of the provinces, on account of our interesting ourfelves fo ferioufly for the prince ftadtholder. On the one hand, we are fuch near relations, that the lot of that prince, his confort, our beloved and worthy fifter (of whole fentiments entirely devoted to the republic, your high mightineffes can have no doubt) and their children and posterity, cannot be indifferent to us. On the other hand, becaufe we know in the most certain manner, and can infure, that the stadtholder and all his family are most affectionately attached to the republic of the United Provinces, and that certainly they will never do any thing against the interest and fystem of the states, but, on the contrary, will always endeavour to preferve them, and contribute to their well-being; to which we muft add, that being the nearest neighbour of the United Provinces, and in confequence of the ties which have never been broken between the two parties, we have great interest that the government of the republic, conformable to the ancient conflication, fhould not be changed in any effential point, but always preferved untouched; and that the inteffine divisions and differences, which certainly were caufed merely by miftruit, may be fettled as foon as poslible, by an equitable, juft, and fincere reconciliation, and by a durable good understanding between all the parties concerned.

We recommend this important affair, together with all that we have mentioned, to your high mightineffes in the most fincere and amicable manner; and as we hope not to fail herein, we reciprocally affure your high mightineffes, that we have, and always thall bear, a neighbourly triendfhip and affection towards the republic in general, and each province in particular.

Of your high mightiness the good friend and neighbour,

- To the Right Honourable the Lords Commificeners of his Majefty's Treasury.
- The Memorial of the General Meeting of W-ft India Planters and Merchants, delivered the 26th of December, 1786;

Humbly fheweth,

HAT, fhould the commercial treaty with France, by which the brandy and wines of that country are to be admitted here on lowered duties, take effect, your memorialifts will be most deeply injured, unlefs the duties on British West India rum shall be reduced.

That rum pays more freight from the place of its growth than brandy, is fubject to higher infurance, fuffers more by leakage from its voyage, and by evaporation from its climate, requires more capital, and produces more lofs of intereft on that capital. That this is particularly true of the rum from Jamaica, which furnifhes the chief fupply for the Britifh market, the infurance in winter from that ifland being eight per cent. a charge only to be avoided on the latter thipments, by a fill greater inconvenience from delaying them till the fpring.

That the fmuggling of rum into Great Britain from the Weft Indies fcarcely exifting, and that of brandy being very confiderable, the duties on the former are far more faithfully collected, and lefs nominal than the latter. And that, with refpect to the frauds in the drawbacks, the higher the original duty, the greater, in cafe of fraud, is the public lofs.

That the duties on French brandy fland lower by the new treaty, than in any before the year 1778, while those on rum rather exceed the standard of that time. That the experiment having been made of raifing the duties on rum and brandy fince 1778, the increase in the rum duties has been fufpended as impolitic, while that on brandy still remains. That, if it has been lately in contemplation to leffen the duties on brandy, as an act of government, independent of any treaty, it is prefumed that it was with a view to diminish the temptation to contraband, and certainly not from tendernefs or predilection to a foreign commodity, which is not neceffary, and forms the material of no particular manufacture, and in preference to a native commodity.

That not only the comparative rate

-rate of duties on rum, thus in fact greater than before, but the circumstances occurring fince 1776, have made it lefs capable of bearing even the fame burthens.-That the import of various fupplies, for the cultivation and fupport of the British West Indies, is rendered more difficult, precarious, and expensive, than before the war, from the impeded intercourfe of the islands with North America; and that a fimilar reftraint prevails in their export trade to North America, which almost folely affects their vent of rum. That other recent burthens are to be found in the rife of freights in the trade with the Weft-Indies, in feveral particulars, and in the various calamities which have lately afflicted the island.

That the very treaty in queffion of itself must occasion a fresh detriment to the iflands, fince, independent of the increased rivalship from French brandy, rum will be effentially hurt by the cheapnefs of French wines, belides the apprehenfion to be entertained of other fimilar treaties, which may be formed with other wine countries. That, while the difficulties attending rum have thus lately augmented, the French government has given various new facilities to the vent of their brandy and other fpirits, still more to ftrengthen the competition between their articles and ours.

That the imports of rum into Great Britain in 1776, and in the last and present year, shew that, when obstructions occur, in the ports of North America, to the trade of the British West Indies (whether by the act of one country or the other) no alternative has prefented itself, but that of sending the superfluous rum to the British market, for which, neverthelefs, the rum of the Windward and Leeward iflands is in general little adapted, though proper for North America. That the quantity of rum, thus turned out of its courfe into the British market, appears not to be inconfiderable, even during a fhort crop, and must greatly overstock the British market, when crops are more abundant.

That your memorialifts find a preference given, by the Methuen treaty, to Portuguefe over French wines, which they thall be doubly concerncd not to fee both adopted and farther increafed in favour of Britifh Weft India over French fpirits, fince they cannot fufpedt that the attachment or value of the fugar colonies to this country has been proved to be inferior to that of Portugal.

That rum is a production, which turns to account all that would be otherwife wafted in the manufacturing of fugar, iffuing from the fame plant, and being relied upon by the planter for paying the principal yearly expences of its cultivation; whatever, therefore, impedes the fale of rum, affects fugar alfo, of which it is the auxiliary and fupport, together with the immenfe duties and extensive navigation, &c. depending on fugar.

That, in confequence of the flort diffance of Britain from France, a very few and fmall fhips can tranfport many goods between them in a flort fpace of time, and of those fhips and crews, a large proportion mult be chiefly French; whereas, between the Britifh Weif India islands and this country, none can navigate but Britifh fhips and Britifh crews; and the length of time spent in the voyage renders the encouragement ragement to Britifli navigation proportionally more confiderable.

That, for thefe, and various other reafons, which your memorialifts might adduce, they truft they may claim the aid of his majefty's miniiters in procuring a proper reduction of the duties on rum, as a meafure clearly confiftent with the prefent treaty, and truly indifpentable to your memorialifts.

Signed,

W. BRAITHWAITE, Chairman.

- In the name of God! Mahome, Ben-Abdala!

Moff illustrious Congress of America !

W E have received your letter by the hands of your ambaffador, and perused its contents with all due attention. We have remarked therein the inclination you exprefs of concluding with us a treaty To this we willingly of peace. have affented, and even ratified the plan, fuch as you have proposed, by fetting thereto our imperial feal. Wherefore we have, from that very moment, given strict command to the captains of our ports, to protect and affift all thips under American colours, and, in fhort, to fhew them every favour due to the most friendly powers: Being fully determined to do much, when an opportunity offers. We write this in full testimony of our fincere friendship, and of the peace which we offer on our part.

The Fifth Report of the Commiffioners appointed to examine, take, and flate, the Public Accounts of the Kingdom, relative to the Balance in the Hands of the Paymafter General of the Forces in Office. Prefented to his Majesty upon the 15th of August, 1781; and to both Houses of Parliament upon the 28th of November, 1781.

U PON the certificate of accounts depending in the office of the auditors of the impress next to the paymasters general of the forces out of office, stands the name of the Right Honourable Richard Rigby, the present paymaster general of the forces. In return to our precept, he stated to be in his hands, upon the 28th of November last, a balance of four hundred forty-feven thousand one hundred fifty-three pounds eleven stillings and three pence three farthings.

The act directs, that in taking an account of the public money in the hands of an accountant, "we " fhall confider what fum may be " taken out of his hands, to be dif-" posed of by parliament for the " public fervice." But in an office of fo large a receipt and expenditure as that of the pay-office, through which many millions pass in the year, it was not to be imagined, that a fum in the hands of the paymaster general upon any given day, could pollibly remain long enough in his possession to become a subject capable of fuch difcuffion ; he muft have iffued the whole of it, long be-. fore we could, in the course of our proceedings, have an opportunity of examining it; and therefore we confidered this balance, not with a view to the taking any part of that individual vidual fum out of his hands, but to compare the quantum of that balance with the demands upon it on the day of its date, and to fee whether it was not more than was neceffary to anfwer the then exifting or approaching claims upon the paymatter general of the forces, for the fervices of the army.

That we might be able to form an opinion upon this fubject, we proceeded to enquire of what parts this balance was compounded, at what time each part was received, and for what fervice intended. An inquiry that comprehends the whole extent of the bufinefs in this office.

The public money in the hands of the paymafter general is received by him, either from the exchequer, or from the treafury of Ireland, when Irifh regiments are drawn out of that kingdom, and in part paid by Great Britain; or from perfons who, upon their accounts being fettled, are directed by the king's warrant to pay the balance into his hands.

The prefent paymaster general has no money in his hands received from the treafury of Ireland; all the accounts of the Irish regiments being made up, and their whole pay now borne by Great Britain. The fum in his hands, arifing from balances directed to be paid to him, was, upon the 1st of February last, eight thousand four hundred fixtythree pounds ten shillings and four pence. The exchequer is the great fource from whence he draws his iupply.

As the extensive transactions of the last year would probably furnish us with instances of every species of receipt and issue, we procured from the treasury an account of the feveral fums issued to the paymaster general of the forces, from the 24th of December 1779 to the 25th of December 1780, and from thence to the 16th of May 1781, diftinguishing the times when issued, and for what particular fervices.

From the examinations of Mr. John Hughfon, clerk of the debentures in the office of the auditor of the exchequer; Richard Molefworth, Efq. late depaty paymailer in North America; the Right Honourable Richard Rigby, the prefent paymafter general; John Powell, Efq. eathier; and Charles Bembridge, Efq. accountant in the office of the paymafter general; we obtained the following account of the manner of tranfacting the bufinefs in this office, and of the balance in queftion.

The fupply for the army is granted by parliament to the king, and therefore no part of this fupply can be iffued from the exchequer, without the royal fign manual authorizing fuch iffue. After the fupply is granted, there comes from the treafury to the pay-office the king's fign manual, directing the lords of the treasury to issue unto the paymaster general a certain part of that supply (in time of war ufually a million) by way of impreit, and upon account, according to fuch warrants and orders as either are or shall be figned by the king. This fign manual, with the treafury warrant, and order of the auditor of the exchequer made in purfuance of the fign manual, after being entered in the pay-office, are lodged at the exchequer, and give the paymaster general a credit there for the fum mentioned in those instruments. To obtain any part of this credit, the paymafter general prefents a memorial to the treasury, specifying the [T]íum.

290] ANNUAL REGISTER, 1786.

fum he requires, and for what fer-The treafury, by letter, divice. rest the auditor of the exchequer to iffue that fum to the paymaster general, upon the unfatisfied order above mentioned. This letter being produced, and paffing through the forms of office, he obtains from them the fum he wants. When the fum in this fign manual is exhaufted, arother fign manual, with the confequential warrant and order, is obtained, and in like manner from time to time renewed, until there is occasion for the last fum, which completes the whole army fupply of the year; when, inflead of a fign manual, there comes a privy feal, directing the issue of that remaining fum, and including, authorizing, confirming, and covering, the whole fupply of that year.

It was utual formerly for the paymafter general to apply to the treafury every four months, each time for about a third part of the fum voted for the fervices of the army, under the general head of fubfiftence and pay of the forces at home and abroad; but fince the year 1759, the practice has been to afk of the treatury, from time to time, for the fums voted under diffinct heads of fervice, and not until the time when the demands for the fervices are near approaching.

The fervices are ranged under two general heads, the ordinary, and the extraordinary; the ordinary, are those for which specific fums are annually voted by parliament; the extraordinary, are those, which, though not provided for by parliament, are nevertheless confidered as necessary, and therefore paid, in confidence of their being provided for in the succeeding feffion.

As the fervice is diffinguished, fo is the application for it to the treafury. Sums for the ordinary fervices are obtained upon the application of the paymaster general himfelf; those for the extraordinary, are directed into his hands, upon the application of others.

After the fupply for the pay of the army is voted by parliament, the fecretary at war fends to the payoffice the four establishments for the year; which are, the guards, garrifons, and land forces; the forces in the plantations, and the garrifons in North America and the Weft Indies; the forces in Minorca and garrison of Gibraltar; and, the militia; with the feveral regulations of the subfistence. The establishment contains the diffribution of the whole fum voted, amongft the feveral regiments, corps, garrifons, officers, and private men, by the day, and by the year, and the grofs fum allowed for each regiment, corps, To each eftablishand garrifon. ment are annexed two warrants, the one directing the paymaster general to make a deduction of twelve pence in the pound out of all he shall issue, called the poundage, and fpecifying to what fervices it fhall be applied; the other, directing a deduction of one day's pay, out of the payments in the establishment, for the use of Chelfea hofpital.

In general, the groß fum allowed for a regiment, or corps, is divided, in the eftablifhment, into five parts, under the defcription of, the full pay of each officer and private man; the allowance to widows; the allowance to the colonel, and for cloathing loft by deferters; the allowance to the captain for recruiting, &c.; and, the allowance to the agent. But in the pay-office this groß grofs fum undergoes a different division, confitting of, the fubfittence, the poundage, the holpital, the allowance to widows, the nett offreckonings, the clearings, and fometimes respits.

It is in confequence of thefe deductions from, and divisions of, the großs fums allotted to different corps, and of diffinct fums being provided by parliament for certain fervices, that the application by the paymafter general to the treasury, for money, is made under diffinct heads of fervice. Thefe fervices may, for the purpofe of our inquiry, be diftinguished under three heads:

First. Those fervices for which the whole sum received by the paymaster general, at the exchequer, is issued by him soon after he receives it.

Secondly. Thofe, for which the fum he receives, belonging to particular perfons, remains in his poffeffion, upon account of the perfons entitled, until they, or their agents, apply to him for payment.

Thirdly. Those, for which a part only of the fum he receives is iffued by him foon after he receives it, and the remainder continues in his hands for any indefinite time.

Of the first class, where he foon iffues all he receives, are, the returned poundage; Chelfea hospital, and the out-pensioners; the subsistence of the forces in Jamaica and the East Indies, and of the non-commissioned officers and private men in Africa; the fublishence and cloathing of the milicia and invalids; the fublishence issue and cloathsubsisted upon account; the floppages of the officers; fublishence in the Welt Indies, North America, and garrifons of Gibraltar and Minorca; the general and staff officers and garrifons in Great Britain ; the nett off-reckonings ; the allowances to the colonel, captain, and agent ; the clearings ; foreign fubfidies ; arrears of the foreign troops ; levy money ; and all the extraordinarics. Under the head of fubfiftence of the forces at home, fo much of the fum received, as the fubfiftence actually amounts to, is iffued to the agents as foon as he receives it,

Of the fecond clafs, are, the reduced officers, and, under the feveral heads of the garrifons abroad, the general and flaff officers, and hofpital abroad : fo much of the fums voted for thefe fervices, as is contained in each warrant for the pay of the officers named in the certificate, remains in his hands until thofe officers or their agents apply for it.

Of the third class, where he iffues a part only of the fums he receives, are, the fubfiftence of the forces at home; the fubfiltence of the non-commissioned officers and private men of the British forces in the Weft Indies and North America, and of the foreign troops; the garrifons abroad; and, the general and flaff officers and hofpital abroad. Befides these, there are some other heads of fervice, to fatisfy which, he does not expressly apply to the treafury for money, but pays the demands for them out of what he has received under other heads of fervice : these are, the allowance to widows; fome fervices to which the poundage is made fubject by the king's warrant; and, contingencies.

Having thus procured the knowledge of the fervices, and of the mode of receiving from the exche-[T] = 2 quer, and of isluing money for each tervice; it remained, in order to find out the component parts of this balance, to compare the fums received for thefe fervices, with the fams islued, and fee what remained in the hands of the paymafter general under each head: but the manner in which the accounts in this office are now, and have been kept from time immemorial, rendered fuch an investigation hardly practicable.

When the paymaster general passes an account before the auditor of the impreft, he charges himfelf therein with the money he has received out of the exchequer, during the period of that account, in one grofs fum; he verifies the charge by the imprest roll, which fpecifies the fums he has received in each memorial, and the terms in which he received them, but not for what fervices; all that is required of him is, to render an account for what fervices he has expended the fam imprested to him : to do this confidently with order and method, his payments muit be arranged under dittinct heads of fervice; but there is no necessity for making the like arrangements of his receipts, it would only occafion the entry of a variety of articles in his charge, instead of one, which one aniwers full as well all the purposes of passing his accounts. With a view to this, is formed the plan upon which his books are kept; the accounts of his payments are under feparate and diffinct heads of fervice, but he has only one cafh account; though in one memorial to the treasury, he often asks for several sums, under various diffinct heads of fervice, yet he enters the receipt in his cath-book, as one entire fum received that day at the exchequer, and carries it as one fum to the king's account current in his ledger : to have found out, therefore, the favings in his hands, under any one head of fervice, he muft have examined every memorial prefented by him to the treasury for the thirteen years he has been in office, and have extracted from thence, and collected together, all the fums he has received for that fervice, in order to compare them with the islues. And here too arofe another difficulty:-In this office, a payment for any fervice made in a subsequent year, is entered in the account of that year in which the fum was voted for that fervice, unlefs fuch account is made up, and then it is entered in the next open year's account; hence thefe accounts are usually kept open, until they are ready to be paffed by the auditors of the impreft; which time not being yet come for the accounts of the paymaiter general in office, not one of his ledgers are yet made up; he could not therefore have given us the iffues for any one fervice, without making up the account of that fervice, in every year's ledger, fince lie has been in office.

Thinking ourfelves by no means warranted to take up the time, and perhaps impede the current bufinefs of this office, at fo bufy and important a period, by employing them in fo laborious, and, unlefs for this particular purpofe, fo ufelefs a talk, we had recourfe to fuch other circumfances in evidence before us, as might lead us to a decifion upon the point we are purfuing.

From the arrangement we have made of the fums received by the paymafter general from the exchequer, quer, it appears, that the balance in his hands cannot confilt of any fums comprehended in the first clafs, becaufe of them he very foon iffues all he receives : Nor is it probable that fums in the fecond clafs can conflitute any very confiderable part of it; becaufe it is not to be prefumed, that officers of any denomination will fuffer their pay to continue long without applying for it, either by themfelves or their agents.

A continual receipt and iffue, implies a balance continually in hand ; there must be the like continual balance where there are intervals between the receipt and iffue, and a fresh supply always comes in before the iffue, as in the cafe of every bank: but our enquiry is after a fum more permanent; a fum that remains long unapplied to any fervice, and which, if otherwife difpofed of, would occafion no interruption in the regular course of paying the army fervices; for fuch a balance, in the hands of the paymaiter general, we muft look amongst the fums for the fervices named in the third class, where he iffues lefs than he receives.

Under the denomination of fubfiftence for the forces at home, he receives more than that fubfittence amounts to, with an intent of procuring thereby a fund for certain payments not fpecifically applied for by him, and therefore otherwife unprovided for : he receives fubfiltence upon the full establishment of the non-commissioned officers and private men of the British forces in North America and part of the West Indies, and of the foreign troops; but as thefe regiments must be incomplete, and the deputy paymasters there iffue subsistence according to the firength only of the regiment, he does not remit to them the whole he receives, but fo much only as, from the laft accounts they fend him of the flate of the balances in their hands, he judges will be fufficient to enable them to carry on the public fervice. This unified fubfiltence of the British forces in the Weft Indies and North America continues in his hands till the accounts of the feveral regiments are made up, when it falts into the clearings, and is iffued to the agents; but this is not till fifteen or fixteen months after they become due. The unifued subfishence of the foreign troops remains with him till their arrears are paid to the agents; which time feems, from the account of the iffues received from the treafury, generally to be about two years after they are due.

He receives the whole fums voted for garrifons, staff, and hospital abroad; but the officers in these departments, named in the certificates from the war-office, do not exhault the whole fum voted.

Hence arifes a fund compoled of thefe favings, out of which he iffues for certain fervices, and defrays certain expences, without making any fpecific application for them to the treafury; thefe are, the allowance to widows; fome of the payments to which the poundage is inade applicable by the king's warrante; and, the mifcellaneous head of contingencies.

To demands for thefe fervices, and to no other that we can discover (except fuch claims for the pay of the general and fraff officers, and officers of the garrifons and holpitals abroad, and of the reduced efficers, as remained unfatisfied) was this balance liable on the day of its date. What then was the amount of thefe [97] 3 demands at that time? Nothing had been iffued for the allowance to widows in the year 1780; for enough remained of former receipts, in the hands of the paymaster of the widows penfions, to carry on that fervice; and therefore this balance was not liable to be reduced by any iffue under the head of allowance to widows. We could not have the accounts of the payments out of poundage and hospital, and for the contingencies in the year 1780, becaufe fome of the warrants had not been produced for payment, and therefore the accounts could not be made up; but finding, that where the establishments are nearly the fame, there is no confiderable difference between the payments made, upon these two heads, in one year and another; we applied to the pay-office for an account of the payments made by the paymafter general, out of the deductions of twelve pence in the pound, and one day's pay; and for an account of the payments made by him for the contingent expences of his majefty's forces, for the last year in which thefe accounts were made up at the office. The accounts transmitted to us, pursuant to this requisition, are of the year 1778; and as they, probably, do not vary much from those of the year 1780, they will fnew us, with fufficient accuracy, the amount of the demands for these two heads of fervice upon the balance now before us. The payments out of the poundage and one day's pay, confift of falaries to officers, exchequer fees, returned poundage, and Chelfea hofpital; the whole amount of which, for this one year, is one hundred fourteen thousand two hundred fixty-five pounds ten fillings and two pence. The articles of exchequer fees, returned poundage, and Chelfea hospital, though placed to this account, are not demands upon this balance. The exchequer fees for every fum, are always paid at the exchequer out of the fum at the time it is received ; the paymatter general debits his cash with the whole sum he applies for, and credits it for the fees; and therefore the only alteration made in his cash, is an increafe by the fum he afks, deducting the exchequer fees. The other two fervices being applied for under their specific heads, he receives a fum with one hand, and issues it with the other; and therefore thefe three articles, amounting to ninetyfeven thousand nine hundred and twelve pounds feven shillings and fix pence, being deducted from the total, leaves the fum of fixteen thousand three hundred fifty-three pounds two shillings and eight pence only, as a charge upon this balance; which fum, confifting chiefly of falaries, for the most part paid quarterly, foon after they become due, leaves claims to a very fmall amount indeed to be fatisfied out of this balance.

The contingent expences confift of a variety of articles, amounting to twenty-four thousand nine hundred and fourteen pounds nineteen shillings and eight pence; this account never either much exceeds, or comes much under, twenty-four thousand pounds, the sum voted for the contingencies upon the effablifhment at home and abroad; for fo much of these payments as exceed the fum voted, are carried to the account of extraordinaries. These articles being paid fome quarterly, fome half-yearly, and fome yearly, no very confiderable part of them can can probably remain unpaid at the end of the eleventh month of that year, and cannot therefore be a charge upon this balance on the 28th of November 1780: from hence it follows, that, supposing the amount of the claims for these fervices in 1780 not to exceed their amount in 1778, the claims for thefe fervices upon this balance, upon the 28th of November 1780, was fo much only of the fums of fixteen thousand three hundred fifty-three pounds two fhillings and eight pence, and twenty-four thoufand nine hundred fourteen pounds nineteen fhillings and eight rence; making together forty-one thousand two hundred fixty-eight pounds two fhillings and four pence; as had not been applied for, and fatisfied, during the first eleven months of that year; and therefore, we think ourfelves well grounded in an opinion, that the fum of four hundred forty-feven thousand one hundred fifty-three pounds eleven shillings and three pence three farthings, in the hands of the paymaster general of the forces, upon the 28th of November laft, was greatly more than was neceffary to answer the claims upon him at that time for the fervice of the army.

But our inquiry did not reft here ; it concerns the public to know what proportion the fum, continually in the hands of an officer to whom fo much is entrusted, bears to the fervices of his department; we required, therefore, from the payoffice, an account of the balance in the hands of the prefent paymaiter general of the forces, on the 31st of December 1768, and at the end of each fucceeding year, to the 31ft of December 1780, inclusive ; and an account of the total fums received and paid by the paymafter general for every month, from the 1st of January 1780 to the 31ft of May last, with the total of the balance remaining in his hands at the end Thefe accounts of each month. fhew, that the average yearly balance in the hands of the prefent paymaiter general, for twelve years, has been five hundred eighty-five thousand eight hundred ninety-eight pounds; and his average monthly balance, for feventeen months, has been eight hundred fixty-nine thousand one hundred forty-eight pounds.

The magnitude of these sums furnifhes a firong prefumption, that the paymafter general of the forces posseffes, constantly, a sum much larger than is requifite for the carrying on the army fervices; and we are confirmed in this opinion, by the state of the balances in the poffeilion of the paymafters general of the forces after their refignation, annexed to our laft report ; by which it appears, that of four paymatters general, each, upon his quitting the office, took with him the fum then in his hands; the balances they returned to our precepts, above twelve years after their refignations, were even then very large. Lord Holland's balance, the Christmas after he quitted the office in 1765, was four hundred and fixty thousand pounds; in the year 1778, at the time his reprefentatives paid back into the exchequer two hundred thousand pounds, it was four hundred and fifty thousand pounds; and, upon the 27th of September last, the fum returned to our requifition was two hundred and fiftyfix thousand pounds; fo that, during a period of fifteen years after he was out of office, it fuffered very little little diminution from any claims whatever.

From thefe facts we may infer, that a paymafter general, at the time of his refignation, be it when it will, takes with him a fum of public money, a great part of which remains with him, unapplied to any public fervice, until his accounts are paffed by the auditors of the impreit; and confequently, that he has conitantly in his hands greatly more than he wants for the purpofes for which it was iffued to him.

During the courfe of our inquiry, certain circumftances in this office attracted our attention, as fubjects demanding prefent correction, and prevention for the future.

The ufual course of the receipts and iffues in this office, for feveral years, has constantly put into the hands of the paymaster general a large fum of public money not employed in the public fervice, exprefsly contrary to that found maxim of prudence and conomy, That more fhould not be iffued from the exchequer for any fervice, than that fervice wants. He afks fums of the treafary under fpecific heads of fervice, and in the form of a computation; the treafury direct the issue in the terms he afks it, without knowing whether the fervice is adequate to the requifition, whether the computation be just, and whether he has not already in his hands full as much as he wants : there is no controul upon him in the exchequer; the only attention of that office is, to fee that the iffue does not exceed his credit, and that his credit does not exceed the fup. ply for the army fervices, voted by parliament that year. Supposing the conflictution of this office to continue in its prefent form, we think the interpofition of fome check neceffary, to reduce and confine this balance within its due bounds. The paymafter general can receive nothing from the exchequer, but by direction of the treasury; the treafury, therefore, fhould have the means of judging upon the propriety and neceffity of the requifition; to which a frequent knowledge of his balance is effential; and therefore we are of opinion, that in the first memorial prefented every month, by the paymaster general of the forces to the lords of the treafury, for a fupply for the army fervices, he fhould always infert the fum total of the balance of public money, for the fervice of the army, at that time in his hands, cuftody, or power. What those due bounds are, within which this balance ought to be circumfcribed, depends upon a variety of circumfances, of which the treafury may, upon examination, obtain knowledge fufficient to direct their judgment.

But this usage of office operates fill further; it is not confined to the paymafter general in being only, but he has been permitted, after his refignation, and his reprefentatives, in cafe of his death, to retain the money of the public, until the final adjustment of his accounts by the auditors of the impreft. The average of Lord Holland's balance, from his refignation in the year 1765, to the year 1778, when the two hundred thoufand pounds were paid into the exchequer, by his reprefentatives, was four hundred fifty five thousand feven hundred thirty-five pounds. The average of the balance of the prefent paymafter general, from the year year 1768, when he came into office, to the fame year 1778, was four hundred fifty-three thouland one hundred and eighty pounds; making together nine hundred and eight thousand nine hundred and fifteen pounds; a fum belonging to the public, in the possession of only two of their officers, for nine years, and the public reaping no benefit from it whatever.

The public good calls for fo effectual a correction of this evil, as to prevent it from ever happening for the future. As there should be a check upon the balance of a paymaster general whilst he is in office, it is equally expedient that he fhould retain his balance as fhort a time as possible after his refignation; that he fhould pay it over to his fucceffor, and the fubfequent bufinefs be carried on by him, at least as much of it as can be transacted by him without caufing confusion or According to the prefent delay. courfe of bufinels in this office, upon the refignation of a paymaster general, his accounts of the year's establishment are carried on to the 24th of June, or 24th of December, preceding or fubfequent to his refignation, as is most convenient to the public fervice; when it is fubfequent, he receives from the exchequer, though out of office, his proportion of the supply of the year to that time, and applies it in difcharge of the demands upon the fervice, which accrued down to that period; but of thefe demands, fome do not come in a course of payment, others are not applied for till fome time after they are due; neither the nett off-reckonings nor the clearings, which are the laft payments on account of a regiment, are discharged till fifteen or fixteen months after they become due ; the general, staff, and reduced officers, do not all apply immediately for their pay; warrants for contingencies are frequently not produced until feveral months after they are payable; and the paymaster general has deputies in various parts of the world, whofe accounts he must have time to adjust; it is therefore convenient, and prevents trouble to the office, that his bufinefs flould be carried on, and fo much of the public money as is necessary for that purpole continue in his hands for fome fhort time afterwards; and if the balance be confined within its proper bounds, whilft he is in office, the interest of the public will not be materially affected by the detention of a moderate balance, for a few months after his refignation.

If claimants for fums directed, but not applied for, in the time of the predeceffor, muft, according to the prefent forms of office, have recourfe to the treafury for new warrants, those forms are inconvenient, and should be altered; the fucceffor should be empowered to pay fuch demands, under the authority given to the predeceffor, without putting claimants to the trouble and expense of a fecond application.

Was the paymafter general to retain his balance until his accounts are finally adjufted, the public would be kept out of their money to a very diffant and uncertain period. It is fixteen years fince Lord Holland refigned, and his accounts are fill in the office of the auditors of the impreft unfettled; the prefent paymafter general has been in office thirteen years, and the first three years and a half only of his accounts accounts are fent into that office, and in their first stage. The public have a right to be informed how their money has been expended, and as speedily as possible after the expenditure: the evils attending delay are many and obvious, both to the perfon accounting, and to those entitled to call for the account. Being accuflomed to go in one track, and long inattention to this point, in the departments both of the paymafter general and of the auditors of the imprest, added to a great increase of business, have produced long arrears; it requires, and there ought to be, an extraordinary exertion in both offices, to bring the accounts forward, and to introduce and establish that order and regularity in making them up, and keeping them, which should be itricity adhered to in every office of account. To obtain and preferve an accurate and competent knowledge of the flate they are in, they should be made up and balanced once a year, to a certain itated time, and as foon as may be after that flated time is elapfed. But flie time it takes to complete the pavment of certain fervices, and the manner of carrying on fome branches of the bufinets in this office, are impediments to fuch a regulation, and feem not well calculated either for perfpicuity or expedition. There are certain fervices, for which no fpecific fums are appropriated, either by the vote of parliament, or by the diffribution in the eftablishment ; but they are paid out of funds compounded of a great variety and number of articles, substracted from various different grofs fums, either voted cr allotted for certain purpofes ; these fervices are, Chelfea hospital, the allowance to widows, the cloathing of the reguiars, exchequer fees, and falaries to certain officers. One of these funds is the poundage, which confifts of various deductions (f twelve pence in the pound upon almost every individual inm (except the half pay, of which the deduction is only fix pence in the pound) veted, or allotted by the diffributions in the establishments, for the army fervices: out of this fund are paid, ift. The returned poundage; that is, this ery deduction, thus made, is paid back to certain corps; fo that this part of it feems to be deducted for no other purpole but that of returning it back again. 2dly. A part of this poundage is applied to vards the expences of Chelfea 3dly. The remainder hoipital. pays the exchequer fees, and the falaries of the paymaster general, and of other officers.

The expences attending Chelfea hofpital are paid out of two funds, blended together; the one is part of the poundage above mentioned; the other is formed of the deductions of one day's pay of every perfon named in fome of the eftablishments, and of fome of the eftablishments, and of fome of the perfons named in other of the eftablishments: to form this fund, and that of the poundage, and to make these feveral deductions, is the business of the pay-office.

The allowance to widows, confifts of the pay of two private men a company, and is a part of the establishment in every regiment; this comes from the war-office, but the feveral articles are collected together from the regimental diffributic.as, and formed into a fund, in the pay-office.

The fund for the cloathing is called the nett off-reckonings; and 6 is composed of deductions made in the pay-office, out of the fums allotted in the establishment for the full pay of the non-commissioned officers and private men, in most of the regiments and corps.

One effect of these operations is, that in making up the state of every regiment in the pay-office, the fum allotted for its pay in the establishment must confist of fix parts; the poundage, the hospital, the subsistence, the allowance to widows, the off-reckonings, and the clearings, and fometimes respits. This state, befides the bufinels it creates in the pay-office, must be examined, computed, and figned, by the agent; for he receives the clearings, which is the balance due to the regiment; the truth of which balance depends upon the justness of the calculation of the other divisions: it must be examined too, and computed, by the auditor of the imprest; for the paymafter general taking credit in his account for the whole pay of each regiment, and furcharging himself with the total amount of the deductions of the poundage, hofpital, and widows, in every year, the auditor cannot know the accuracy of the furcharge, without an examination of each article that compoles it.

To perfons accufiomed to the courfe of office, thefe computations are eafy and familiar; but they certainly muft take up time; an objeft, confidering the preient flate of the army accounts, worth attending to. If, inflead of thefe deductions, certain fpecific diffinet fums were effimated and fet apart for thefe fervices in the effablihment; if diftioft accounts were kept of the receipts and payments, under each head of fervice; if the cloathing of the regulars was voted like the cloathing of the militia, separate from the establishment ; if the sum allotted to a regiment fhould be the actual pay, and the whole of it be distributed amongst the officers and private men, and paid to them without deduction, at fuch times and in fuch proportions as shall be deemed beit for the fervice; if every diffinct fervice had its diffinct appropriation, which can be eafily effimated by the experience of preceding years; it fhould feem as if this branch of the pay of the army might be carried on in a more fimple, expeditious, and intelligible manner.

In public trufts, the pofiibility of a lofs fhould be guarded against, as much as the nature of the trufts will admit, without any respect to perfons, or placing any more confidence in any man than can be The fums that appear to helped. have been intrutted to paymatters general, are of a magnitude that implies danger to the public; for who can give, or find fecurity for the payment of them ? At the head of this clafs of accountants, fiands an instance of an actual loss; the laft account that was paffed of Lord Lincoln's was to the 24th of December 1719, between which, and the 25th of June 1720, four hundred feventy-three thousand one hundred twenty-feven pounds, were iffued to him from the exchequer; of this fum it does not appear that anv account was ever given, nor have we been able to trace, either in the pay-office, or in that of the auditors of the impreft, the expenditure of any part of it; neither book nor paper, relative to this account, is to be found in either of those offices. It has been the practice tice of the paymafters general, when they went out of office, to take with them the books and papers that relate to their accounts, as their own private property; but as the paymafter general is an officer appointed to a public truft, his office created for the ufe of, and supported by, the public, and his books conrain accounts of the receipt and expenditure of public money; we are of opinion, that all thefe official books and papers are, and fhould be confidered as the property of the public, and as fuch left and deposited in the pay-office, for the use and information of posterity.

The regulations hitherto fuggelted, are upon a supposition that the conflitution of this office continues in its prefent form; but there is a modification, which, if it can be adopted, will effectually remove the power, and therefore the poffibility, of lofs or abufe; that is, by taking away from the paymafter general of the forces the cuftody of the public cash, and placing it in the bank of England; this treafury will then be converted into an office of mere account, and the paymaster general, instead of being the banker of the army, will be the inftrument only, through whom the army fervices are paid, without having the power of applying the public money to any other purposes whatever. Some judgment may be formed how far this plan is practicable, by comparing the alteration it will make in the great outlines of the bufinefs of this office, the receipt, the iffue, the keeping the accounts, and the accounting, with the forms now in ufe. The imprest must be to the bank; the bank must make the payments, by means of checque drafts drawn by the paymafter general, specifying the warrant, and the fervice : the paymafter generalmust keep the account of these receipts and payments, and the bank a duplicate ; both must join in pasting the accounts, the one producing the warrants difcharged by his drafts, the other producing the drafts discharged by payment. Under the prefent conftitution of this office, the paymaster general keeps his cafh at the bank; the bank receives it at the exchequer on his account; he never pays in cash, but by his cashiers drafts on the bank : he keeps the account of all thefe receipts and payments, as if they were transacted in cash: the warrant indorfed, or the warrant and receipt, or the warrant and regimental pay-book, figned by the agent, and receipt for the offreckonings, are his vouchers: his deputies pay, when they can, by drafts upon the agent to the remitter, who is the bank abroad, and accountable to the public.

Such is the fimilitude between the mode propofed and the mode in ufe; and thus far this regulation carries with it all the appearance of being reducible to practice.

We are well aware of the difficulties that must for ever attend the introducing novelty of form into ancient offices, framed by the wifdom of our ancettors, and eftablished by the experience of ages; they are confidered as incapable of improvement; the officers educated in, and accultomed to the forms in use, are infenfible of their defects, or, if they feel them, have no leifure, often no ability, feldom any inclination, to correct them; alarmed at the idea of innovation, they refift the propofal of a regulation, because it is a change, though from a perplexed

2 perplexed and intricate, to a more fimple and intelligible fystem.

To trace this alteration through every branch of the bufinefs, to mark all its effects, that it does not in anywife difturb the pay of the army, perplex the accounts, or throw difficulties or delay in the passing them; to point out the steps by which it ought gradually and methodically to be introduced, is a work of long ferious attention and accurate examination; but the appearance this plan carries with it of being practicable, and the advantage it holds out to the public, in an office, that certainly stands in need of fome reform, afford us fufficient reafon for fubmitting the confideration of it to the wifdom of the legiflature.

Character * of Dr. Samuel Johnson. Extracted from Mrs. Piozzi's Anecdotes concerning him.

T is usual, I know not why, when a character is circuit with a defcription of the perfon; that which contained the foul of Mr. Johnson deferves to be particularly described. His stature was remarkably high, and his limbs exceedingly large: his ftrength was more than common I believe, and his activity had been greater I have heard than fuch a form gave one reason to expect: his features were strongly marked, and his countenance particularly rugged; though the original complexion had certainly been fair, a circumstance fomewhat unufual: his fight was near, and otherwife imperfect; yet his eyes, though of a light grey colour, were fo wild, fo piercing, and at times fo fierce, that fear was I believe the first emotion in the hearts of all his beholders. His mind was fo comprehensive, that no language but that he used could have expressed its contents; and fo ponderous was his language, that fentiments lefs lofty and lefs folid than his were, would have been encumbered, not adorned by it.

Mr. Johnfon was not intentionally however a pompous converter; and though he was accufed of using big words as they are called, it was only when little ones would not express his meaning as clearly, or when perhaps the elevation of the thought would have been difgraced by a drefs lefs fuperb. He used to fay, " that the fize of a man's understanding might always be justly measured by his mirth;" and his own was never contemptible. He would laugh at a ftroke of genuine humour, or fudden fally of odd abfurdity, as heartily and freely as I ever yet faw any man, and though the jeft was often fuch as few felt befides himfelf, yet his laugh was irrefiftible, and was obferved immediately to produce that of the company, not merely from the notion that it was proper to laugh when he did, but purely out of want of power to forbear it. He was no enemy to fplendour of apparel or pomp of equipage-" Life (he would fay) is barren enough furely with all her trappings; let us therefore be cautious how we firip her." In matters of still higher moment he once observed, when speaking on the subject of sudden innovation, -"He who plants a forest may doubtlefs cut down a hedge; yet I could wish methinks that even he would wait till he fees his young plants grow."

With regard to common occurrences, Mr. Johnfon had, when I first knew him, looked on the fuilshifting scenes of life till he was weary; for as a mind flow in its own nature, or unenlivened by information, will contentedly read in the fame book for twenty times perhaps, the very act of reading it, being more than half the bufinefs, and every period being at every reading better understood; while a mind more active or more skilful to comprehend its meaning is made fincerely fick at the fecond perufal; fo a foul like his, acute to difcern the truth, vigorous to embrace, and powerful to retain it, foon fees enough of the world's dull profpect, which at first, like that of the fea, pleafes by its extent, but foon, like that too, fatigues from its uniformity; a calm and a ftorm being the only variations that the nature of either will admit.

Of Mr. Johnfon's erudition the world has been the judge, and we who produce each a fcore of his fayings, as proofs of that wit which in him was inexhauftible, refemble travellers who having vifited Delhi or Golconda, bring home each a handful of Oriental pearl to evince the riches of the Great Mogul. May the public condefcend to accept my ill-ftrung felection with patience at least, remembering only that they are relics of him who was great on all occafions, and, like a cube in architecture, you beheld him on each fide. and his fize fill appeared undiminifhed.

As his purfe was ever open to alms-giving, fo was his heart tender to thole who wanted relief, and his foul fufceptible of gratitude, and of every kind imprefion: yet though he had refined his fenfibility, he had not endangered his quiet, by encouraging in himfelf a folicitude about trifles, which he treated with the contempt they deferve.

It was well enough known before thefe fheets were publified, that Mr. Johnfon had a roughnefs in his manner which fubdued the faucy, and retrified the meek: this was, when I knew him, the prominent part of a character which few durft venture to approach fo nearly; and which was for that reafon in many respects grofsly and frequently miftaken, and it was perhaps peculiar to him, that the lofty confcioufness of his own fuperiority, which animated his looks, and raifed his voice in converfation, caft likewife an impenetrable veil over him when he faid nothing. His talk therefore had commonly the complexion of arrogance, his filence of fupercilioufnefs. He was however feldom inclined to be filent when any moral or literary queflion was flarted : and it was on fuch occafions, that, like the fage in Raffelas, he fpoke, and attention watched his lips; he reafoned, and conviction clofed his periods : if poetry was talked of, his quotations were the readieft; and had he not been eminent for more folid and brilliant qualities, mankind would have united to extol his extraordinary me-His manner of repeating mory. deferves to be deferibed, though at the fame time it defeats all power of defcription; but whoever once heard him repeat an ode of Horace, would be long before they could endure to hear it repeated by another.

His equity in giving the character of living acquaintance ought not undoubtedly to be omitted in his own, whence partiality and prejudice were totally excluded, and truth alone prefided in his tongue: a fteadiness of conduct the more to be commended, as no man had ftronger likings or averfions. His veracity was indeed, from the most trivial to the most folemn occasions, strict, even to feverity; he fcorned to embellift a flory with fictitious circumflances, which (he used to fay) took off from its real value. " A flory (fays (fays Johnfon) fhould be a fpecimen of life and manners; but if the turrounding circumflances are falfe, as it is no more a reprefentation of reality, it is no longer worthy our attention."

For the reft-That beneficence which during his life increafed the comforts of so many, may after his death be perhaps ungratefully forgotten; but that piety which dictated the ferious papers in the Rambler, will be for ever remembered; for ever; I think, revered. That ample repository of religious truth, moral wifdom, and accurate criticifm, breathes indeed the genuine emanations of its great author's mind, expressed too in a style fo natural to him, and fo much like his common mode of converfug, that I was myfelf but little aftonifhed when he told me, that he had fcarcely read over one of those inimitable effays before they went to the prefs.

I will add one or two peculiarities more, before I lay down my pen. Though at an immeafurable diffance from content in the contemplation of his own uncouth form and figure, he did not like another man much the lefs for being a coxcomb. mentioned two friends who were particularly fond of looking at themfelves in a glafs-" They do not furprife me at all by fo doing (faid (ohnion): they fee, reflected in that glafs, men who have rifen from almost the lowest situations in life; one to enormous riches, the other to every thing this world can giverank, fame, and fortune. They fee likewife, men who have merited their advancement by the exertion and improvement of those talents which God had given them; and I fee not why they flould avoid the mirror."

The other fingularity I promited to record, is this. That though a man of obscure birth himtelf, his parciality to people of family was vifible on every occation; its zeal for feberdin, tion warm even to bigotry ; his hatred to innovation, and reverence for the old feudal times, apparent, whenever any poffible manner of shewing them occurred. I have fpoken of his piety, his charity, and his truth, the enlargement of his heart, and the delicacy of his fentiments; and when 1 fearch for fhadow to my portrait, none can I find but what was formed by pride, differently modified as different occafions shewed it; yet never was pride fo purified as Johnson's, at once from meannefs and from vanity .---The mind of this man was indeed expanded beyond the common limits of human nature, and flored with fuch variety of knowledge, that I ufed to think it refembled a royal pleafure-ground, where every plant of every name and nation, flourithed in the full perfection of their powers, and where, though lofty woods and falling cataracts first caught the eye, and fixed the earlieft attention of beholders, yet neither the trim parterre nor the pleafing fhrubbery, nor even the antiquated ever-greens, were denied a place in fome fit corner of the happy valley.

A foort account of the perfor and charaster of Peter the Second, Emperor of Ruffia, and of his lifter the Princefs Nathalia. From Mrs. Vigor's additional letters from Ruffia, nuritten in that Emperor's reign.

" F E appeared tallof his age, has light-brown hair, blue eyes, B 2 rather rather a handfome face, and, 1 fancy a fine complexion; but tanned like a mulatto. He has a very grave look; if I were not speaking of a monarch, I fhould fay, a furly one; fo much fo, that even the bloom of vouth loses its pleafingness by it. He is, they fay, very referved, and does not chule to make himfelf mafter of any language but his own. He was doatingly fond of his fifter*, and the could perfuade him to almost any thing. One anecdote, I think, I can be fure, is true. One of his valet de chambres, a Frenchman, was cutting the princefs's hair, and the talking to him in French, when the emperor came into her apartment, and faid, " Sifter, why do you talk French to him? he speaks better Ruffan than vou do French." She answered, "That is the very reason, brother, why I do it; for would it not be fhameful, that he, who has fo few helps, fhould learn our language better than we learn his who have helps to it ?" He patted her cheek, and kissed her, and faid, " I will apply for the future ;" and to the man, " Do you always fpeak French to me when you are about me." This princels promifed fair to have inherited her grandfather's genius. Count Offerman made use of her influence over his pupil to do, or prevent his doing, any thing he liked or difliked. - Character of the Mogul Emperor, Shaw Aulum, eldeji jon and fucceffor to the famous Aulumgeer Aurengzebe.
- This account is taken from a translation of the memoirs, in the Perfic language, of Eradut Khan, a nobleman of Indothan, by Jonathan Scott, Captain in the fervice of the East India Company, and private Perfian Translator to Governor Hallings.—Eradut Khan was contemporary with, and held high offices under Aurengzebe, and under his fons, and his memoirs are held as highly authentic in Hindoftan.

" CHAW AULUM was generous and merciful, of a great foul tempered with affability, discerning of merit. He had feen the strict exercife of power during the reigns of his grandfather and father, and been used to authority himself for the last fifty years. Time received a new luftre from his acceffion, and all ranks of people obtained favours equal, if not superior, to their mefo that the public forget rits; the excellencies and great qualities of Aulumgeer, which became abforbed in the bounties of his fucceffor. Some narrow-hearted perfons, however, out of ingratitude and envy, attributed his general liberality to ill-placed extravagance and profusion; but it is a fact, that the deferving of every profession, and worthy of all degrees, whether among the learned or the eloquent, the noble or the ignoble, received an attention from the throne, which the eye of time prior to this had never feen, nor had fuca been heard of before by the ears of fame. His perfonal qualities and perfections, fpeech is unequal to relate. His valour was fuch, that he had refolved on meeting Azim Shaw, whofe bravery was celebrated, in fingle combat. His four fons, poffeffed of great power and confiderable force, he fuffered constantly to be near his perfon, never giving himfelf a moment's fulpicion regarding them, nor preventing their forming connections with the prime nobility; upon which fubject I, the humbleft of his flaves, once ventured to prefent him a petition of a cautionary nature, thinking it my duty, as I had often done fo to Aulumgeer. To what I reprefented, he wrote a wife and just reply, which, by God's permission, I will one time or other relate. † The Mahummedans have two grand eeds or holidays, one at the conclution of the ramzaun, and the other on the anniverfary of the day on which Abeaham conferted to facrifice his for. On thefe days, tents are pitched about a mile diftant from the city, to which the emperor goes in great flate to pray, and on his return receives prefents from his ameers, on whom he confers honorary dreffes according to rank. The fame ceremony is oblerved in every town, by the governor. At the laft eede, after prayers, a camel is facrificed, and a finall part of it dreffed, and eaten on the fpot by the emperor and his attendants. The cavalcades which I chanced to attend on each of their days, at Lucnow and Banaris, were very brilliant, and ferved to give an idea of the altonifning fplendor which muft have graced thefe in the flourithing times of the empire. It is probable Mr. Zoffani may offer the public a view of the procefion at Lucnow, on the fuffeed in 1784, as he was prefent, and took a ketch of it.

Seventeen princes, his fons, grandfons, and nephews, fat generally round his throne, in the manner following: -On his right hand, Jehaundaur Shaw, his eldeft fon, with his three fons, his third fon Ruffeh Oofhawn with his three fons, and Bedar Dil, fon to his nephew Bedar Bukht. On his left, Mahummud Azeem Oofhawn with his two fons, and Jehaun Shaw with his fon. * Ali Tibbar, the only furviving fon of Azim Shaw, fat on the right hand of Azeem Ooshawn, and a little to the right, fomewhat advanced, the two fons of Mahummud Kaum Buksh. Behind the royal princes on the right, flood the fons of conquered fovereigus, as of Secunder Adil Shaw of Beejapore, and Kootcub Shaw, king of Golconda; alfo a vaft croud of the nobility, from the rank of feven to three thousand, such as were allowed to be on the platform between the filver rails. How can I mention every particular of the fplendid fcene? On the feeds, and other feftivals, his majefty, with his own hands, gave the betel and perfumes to all in his prefence, according to their ranks. His gifts of jewels, dreffes, and other favours, were truly royal. When in private, he dreifed plain and humbly, like a religious, and daily, without fail, prayed with many in company. Frequently on holidays and Fridays, when travelling, he would read the prayers himfelf, in the grand tent of audience, and repeat portions of the Koraun with a tone and fweetnefs which captivated the most eloquent Arabians. He never missed the devotions of the latter part of the night, and frequently employed the whole in prayer. In the early part of the evening, he had generally an affembly of the religious, or learned men. He himfelf related * traditions, in the number of which he excelled, as well as in a knowledge of the holy laws. He had explored the different opinions of all fects, read the works of all freethinkers, and was well acquainted with the hypotheses of each. On this account, some over-strict devotees accufed him of heterodoxy in his religious opinions, through mere envy of his fuperior abilities. I heard most of his tenets, and lamented the infolence of his vain critics; for it was as clear as the fun, how just and orthodox he was in his opinions on religious points. But how can I enumerate all his perfections ! It would fill volumes to recite but a fmall part."

who gave himfelf no trouble about flate affairs, or to gain the attachment of any of the nobility, as will be feen when I come to relate his reign.

Azeem Oofhawn, the fecond fon, was a statesman of winning manners. Aulumgeer had always purfued the policy of encouraging his grandions, and employing them in public affairs; for, as his fons were ambitious, of great power, and at the head of armies, he thus prudently controuled them, by oppofing to them enemies in their own families, as Bedar Bukht to Azim Shaw, and Azeem Oofhawn to Shaw Aulum. To the latter he had given the advantageous government of the three provinces of Bengal, Bahar, and Oriffa, from whence he had now come with a rich treafure, and confiderable army; and though in the late battle he had performed great fervice, yet he was fuspected by his father, and dreaded as a rival : but to relate the caufes would be useless prolixity.

‡ Ruffeh Oofhawn, the private companion and favourite of his father, was a prince of quick parts, a great proficient in religious learning, a fine writer, and of much knowledge in the law, but at the fame time addicted to pleafure, particularly fond of mufic, and the pomp of courtly fhew. He paid no attention to public affairs, or even thofe of his own houfhold.

whole administration of the empire was long influenced by him. He had the closeft friendship and connection with Monauim Khan, who, by his interest, was appointed vizier."

The following is the account given of the behaviour and conduct of Jchundaur Shaw, after he became Emperor.

" BE it known to those of enlightened understandings, and to the acquainted with the ulages of the world, that if, in the relation of the affairs of my liege and hereditary lord, the emperor Moil ad Dien Jehaundaur Shaw, fome obiervations and expressions should escape my pen, contrary to refpect, and the examples of the hiftoriographers of princes, they will not proceed from difaffection or a prejudiced mind! I know they are improper from the pen of a fervant, and God forgive me ! but by them I mean no dilaffection to his perfon, or difrefpect to the family of Timur; no vent of my own fpleen ; no view to flatter a fucceffor, by disparaging his rival, nor malicious abufe for the neglect or difappointment I may have fuffered during this reign. 1 fwear by God, and God is a facred witneffer of oaths, that I loved him as my fovereign; but, as it was incumbent on me to record the actions of the reigning prince, good or bad, wile or foolifit, in public and private, if they were, without one exception, all unworthy, what can I fay, as a faithful writer ?---

Let it be remembered, that I was nourithed for fifty years under the benignant shadow of the great and glorious emperor Aulumgeer. How fad the alteration I now beheld! Of this man, this wretched idiot, opposite to him in every quality; fucceeding to the very fame empire, fitting on the very fame throne, and the actions he did, what can I fay, or in what terms paint the difgraces they fuffered by his accession ?---I had beheld upon the throne an emperor. Warmth of expression operates in advice : the friends to the *Imaums, from the ardor of their loyalty to the house of Ali, heightened their fivle, and reprefented with all the eloquence of zeal (for which they have been ever praifed by good men) that the oppreffed might draw the fword against a worthlefs tyrant. But I only mean a warning to the family of Timur; for the head of which, let his charater be what it may, 'if I hefitate to facrifice my life, may I be numbered with traitors, and abhorred by my friends !

When Jehaundaur Shaw, by the intrigues and fupport of the ameer al amra Zoolfeccar Khan, had triumphed over his three brothers, and afcended the throne of empire without the fear or dread of a competitor, all the cuftoms of time were changed. He was in himfelf a weak man, effeminately careful of his perfon, fond of eafe, indolent, and totally ignorant of the arts of government. He had alfo blemifhes and low vices unworthy of royalty, and unknown among his illuftrious ancestors. He made the vaft empire of Hindoftan an offering to the foolifh whims of a public courtezan, which tortured the minds of worthy fubjects loyal to his family. The relations, friends and minions of the miffrefs, ufurped abfolute authority in the ftate; and high offices, great titles, and unreafonable grants from the Imperial domains, were showered profusely on beggarly muficians. * Two corores of rupees annually were fettled for the houshold expences of the mistrefs only, exclusive of her cloaths and jewels. The emperor frequently rode with her in a chariot through the markets, where they purchased, agreeable to whim, fometimes jewels, gold, filks, and fine linen; at others, greens, fruits, and the most trifling articles. A woman named

† The celebrated Nizam al Mulluk, who at this time lived a very retired life at Dhely, was one day paffing in a pallekce, with only a few attendants, when, in a narrow firect, he was met by Zohera, who was riding on an elephant, with a great train of forvants. The nizam endeavoured to get out of the way; but, notwithflanding this, Zohera's fervants were infolent to his attendants, and, as fhe paffed by, fhe exclaimed, "Are you the fon of the blind man?" This enraged the nizam, who commanded his people to pull her from her elephant; which they did, with rudencfs. She complained to the miftrefs, who prevailed on the weak Jehaundaur to take notice of it, and command Zoolfeccar Khan to punifh the nizam. The nizam had fufpected this to happen, and had informed the minifter of the affair. When Jehaundaur Shaw fpoke to him, he was anfwered, that, to punifh the nizam for having corrected an infolent upftart, would enrage all the nobility, who would confider the honour of the order as hurt by any affront to the nizam. Jehaundaur, upon this, did not enforce his commands.

Upon Jehaundaur Shaw's promoting one of his miftrefs's relations, a mufician, to a high rank, Zoolfeccar Khan, ameer al amra, out of fneer, demanded of the new-made lord, as a fee for putting his feal of office to the patent, one thouland finall tabors. The mufician complained to Lall Koor, his patronefs, of the indignity offered him; and the told the emperor, infilting that he fhould reprimand the ameer al amra. Jehaundaur Shaw accordingly reproached the minifter, who ironically replied, that, as mufic was the beft recommendation with his majefty for promotion, he had afted the tabors to deliver out to perfons of family, that they might, by practiting upon them, qualify themfelves for high office, and fuceed as well as their inferiors, the muficians. Jehaundaur Shaw felt the force of the fatire, and, being afraid of his minifter, withdrew the patent.

+ Zohera, keeper of a green-stall, one of Lal Koor's particular friends, was promoted to a high rank, with a fuitable jaghire, and her relations exalted to the emperor's favour, which they used to promote the interefts of the courtiers, for large bribes: nor did the nobility decline their patronage, but forgetting their honour, and facrificing decency to the prefent advantage, eagerly flocked to pay adoration to the royal idois, whose gates were more crowded with equipages in general than those of the Imperial palace, fo that to pafs through the fireet where they refided was a matter of difficulty, by reafon of the throng. To do them justice, many of them had generous minds, and performed various good actions in the use of their influence at court. The ridiculous jaunts of the emperor and his mistrefs at last grew to fuch a pitch, that on a certain night, after fpending the day in debauchery, and vifiting different gardens near the city, in company with Zohera the herb-woman, they retired to the house of one of her acquaintance who fold fpirits, with which they all, became intoxicated. After rewarding the woman with a large fum, and the grant of a village, they returned in a drunken plight to the palace, and all three fell asleep on the road. On their arrival, Lall Koor was taken out by her women; but the emperor remained fleeping in the chariot, and the driver, who had fhared in the jollity of his royal mafter, without examining the machine, carried it to the stables. The officers of the palace, after waiting till near morning for his arrival, on finding that the mistrefs had entered her apartments without the emperor, were alarmed for his fafety, and fent to her to enquire concerning his fituation. She defired them immediately to examine the coach, where they found the wretched prince fast afleep in the arms of Zehera, at the diffance of nearly two miles from the palace. This fcandalous event afforded matter of offence to all good fubjects, but of mirth and laughter to the weak Jehaundaur and his abandoned favourites. He after this still more exposed his vices to the public, often, as he paffed through the ffreets, feizing the wives and daughters of the lower tradefmen. Once a week, according to the vulgar fuperflition, he bathed with Lall Koor, concealed only by a fingle cloth, in the fountain of the * Lamp of Dhely, in hopes that this ceremony would promote pregnancy. Happy was the day in which he was bathed in his own blood ! The miftrefs had the infolence to abuse the princefs +Zebe al Nissa, daughter of the emperor Aulumgeer, and aunt to lehaundaur Shaw, with expressions to vile as were unbecoming the meaneft perfon. This princels had neglected to pay compliments to her, which the received from other ladies of rank, and Lall Koor, enraged at this, teazed the emperor to reprove his aunt, and oblige her to fhew attention towards her; but all was vain. However, he fo far complied with her unreafonable entreaties, that he left off vifiting the princefs, and declined going to an entertainment she had prepared for him, without inviting Lall Koor. How fhall I relate all his follies? The above-mentioned are fufficient to fhew the fad chauges of affairs, public and private. His other indecencies are too unworthy of record to relate."

E was of a very extraordinary composition by nature, and if he had not from thence had fome infirmities very prevalent over him, the advantages he had in his education must have rendered him a perfon of rare perfection; and in truth, a perfon of rare parts he was. He was born in Spain, in the early growth of his father's greatnefs, who failed for many years with a full gale of fuccefs, till he was grown to a great height both in title and fortune. In which time his fon received all the benefits of all forts, which a liberal fupport, and a well ordered education could bring to him; and though he made a journey or two into his own country, yet his whole breeding upon the matter was in Spain, till he was thirteen years of age; fo that that language might very well be called his own, and no Spaniard fpoke it more naturally than he did ever after. When by the all-difpofing power of the Duke of Buckingham, his father was not only removed from court, but committed to the Tower, he was fent with a petition to the house of commons on his father's behalf, which he delivered at the bar, with a fhort speech of his own; which being delivered with confidence, by a youth very young, of delicate features, and a very graceful perfon, made a good imprefion on that body, and caufed him to be looked upon as a young man of great expectation; but the fame cloud of prejudice and disfavour still covering his father, though he had his liberty, the whole family retired into the country. His father grew rich, and was efteemed as a very wife man, who had failed very profperonfly, and made a great voyage whilft the wind was with him, and when it raged against him in terrible storms and tempefts preferved himfelf unhurt, and refled in greater fecurity than his enemies; and, it may be, his reputation and effectin was the greater for having no favourable afpect from the court. In this calm the young gentleman was fent to the univerfity of Oxford, being excellently prepared by his youthful ftudies for that approach; and from thence, after fome years spent with notable fuccefs in all kind of learning, he went into France, in the language whereof he was well verfed, and had been carefully inftructed; and, after fome time fpent there, in a condition liberally supported for any virtuous improvement of himfelf, but not for riot or impertinence, he returned again to his country, and his father's house, the most accomplished perfon that that nation, or it may be, that any other at that time could prefent to the world, to which the beauty, comelinefs, and gracefulnefs of his perfon gave no fmall luttre.

It was no finall advantage to him, that the misfortune of his father (though fuch benefits are feldom grateful to those who most enjoy the fruit of them) made his retreat and refidence in the country abfolutely neceffary, for he had feveral temptations and inclinations in his nature, which, if he had lived in court, would have brought him fooner into many difficulties which he was afterwards perplexed with, when he was better able to firuggle with them; and there being no footing for him there, necessity made it his choice to live in the country in his father's house; in which he enjoyed, enjoyed, befides the benefit of his father's information, a very liberal conversation with men of the best quality and parts (who frequently reforted thither, as to a house where they found very good reception) and leifure enough to intend his books, in which he took wonderful delight, and made fo great progrefs, that he was a stranger to no part of learning, and very fubtle in the most curious parts of philosophy, and excellently verfed in the Latin and Greek fathers, and those controverfies in which their authority is applied by all the parties who contend. And in this time he writ a discourse to his coufin Sir Kenclm Digby against the catholic religion, which he would never afterwards take upon him to answer, when he grew to have a better opinion of it, or a worfe of his own, than he was then thought to have ; and left this exercife might make him be thought too grave and ferious for his age, he made it manifest that he was excellently verfed in all polite learning, and in all the poets, Greek and Latin, fo that when a man produced a ferious discourse of his of religion, or the abstruſer part of philotophy, he found commonly in the fame company fomebody, who likewife produced a copy of verfes in Latin, or English, or some facetious difcourfe by letter or otherwife, upon the reading fome book, or lighter argument, writ by the fame pen. And in this bleffed retreat he lived, his great abilities being communicated abroad folicitoutly enough, and his infirmities unknown, but to very few, and as carefully concealed by them; nor was he heard of at court till a too loud, and a furious purfuit of an amour, within the very ears of Whitehall, made him be taken notice of, and for which (af ter he had chaflifed, rather than fought with an infolent, but faint adverfary, who was too much favoured there) he was first committed to prifon, and afterwards very feverely profecuted, with circumflances not usual to perfons of that quality; fo that he was forced again to retire into the country, with fo much more acrimony towards the court, as his own particular reckoning added to his father's accompt; which increased more the stock of his reputation with those who judged of men's affections to their country, by the diffaffection the court had for them, and the reciprocal difesteem they had for it.

When the diforders of Scotland obliged the king to call a parliament, he was, by the universal election of the populous county where he lived, chosen to ferve as one of their knights, where his perfon, and his parts, and the fame and reputa-'tion he had, made him quickly taken notice of; and the conversation he chofe and wedded himfelf to, amongil those who were refolved to find fault with every thing that was amifs, and not to be content with any ordinary application of remedies, made it eafily forefeen what counfels he meant to follow; but that flage allowed fo fhort a time for action, that no poffible conclufions could be made. But a few months after, when the discontents of men were grown higher, and the reverence to the government much impaired, he being then returned again by the fame people to ferve in the fame place, it was quickly diferned that he meant to make himfelf as confiderable as he could. If any thing was fpoken against the government more bluntly and rudely, Jv, he took up the argument and polished it, making the edge more Tharp to wound than it was before, dreffing the general charge with iome finart inflances, which made the enormity more fensible, and his delivery, and manner of speaking, from to lovely a perfon, and a very lovely aspect he had, was fo graceful (though not altogether without affectation) that it wonderfully reconciled him to his auditors. When any grievances in religion were rouched upon, and the government of the church affaulted or reproached, no man improved the discourse with more bitternels and animolity, fpeaking of the things he would be thought to value, gravely, and, as it feemed, with piety and devetion; and of the perfons against whom he found it grateful to inveigh, wittily and pleafantly, and fcornfully; fo that that party, which had the most mischievous intentions in religion, and against the church, believed that they had gotten a champion to their own defire, who would be equal to their flouteft adverfary, even to the bifhops themfelves. The greateft combination was, and which was least communicated, the defign againft the Earl of Strafford ; which was no fooner entered upon, and fome thort inftances given of his exercife of a very exorbitant power in Ireland, than he entered into the argument, made him the chief author of all that was grievous in England, giving fome inftances of words and expressions he had used in private conversation, of a very unpopu-Inr nature, which he took upon himfelf to prove; which fome very confiderable actors in that tragedy did often proteit afterwards was the principal inducement to their hafty refelation of clarging that earl with high treafon. And from hence he grew into fo entire a confidence with the other cabal, which did not then conflit of above feven or eight, that he was immediately received into the bowels of their defign, and made one of those who were trusted to prepare fuch a charge against the Earl, that might fatisfy the reft that they had done well in accusing him; and fo he became quickly privy to all their fecrets, knew what every particular man thought he knew, and by what means they intended to know more, what proofs they could for the prefent make, and how they meant to support and enlarge those truths, all their arts and artifices, which were neceffary to be communicated amongst themselves, and with those lords who were joined with them, to make their confpiracy more practicable. In a word, the whole method they proposed for their proceedings, and what they most apprehended might obstruct those proceedings, was as clearly understood by him, as by Mr. Pym and Mr. Hambden themfelves. Having now got himfelf to the top of the pinnacle, he began to look about him, and take a full profpect of all that was to be feen; and it is very possible, that the desperate defigns of the perfons with whom he had communicated, not answerable to the reputation they had of integrity to the nation, the uningenuity of their proceeding, and the foul arts they could give themfelves leave to use, to compass any thing they proposed to do; as in trath their method was, first to confider what was necessary to be done for some public end, and which might reafonably enough be withed for that public end, and then to make no fcruple of doing any thing which might.

might probably bring the other to pais, let it be of what nature it would, and never fo much concern the honour or interest of any perfon who they thought did not, or would not favour their defigns : I fay, poffibly this obfervation might make fome impression upon him, who without doubt had no wicked purpofes himfelf. Let what would be the caufe or the temptation, refolve he did, to fteer another courfe, and to fet up for himfelf upon that flock of commodities, in the getting together whereof there were fo many joint fharers with him; and fo he found ways eafily enough (and his nature was marvelloufly difpoled to that dexterity) to infinuate to the court, that, if they gave him reasons for it, they might depend upon his fervice, and that he would make it very useful to them : and the freights they were in, and the benefit they might receive from fuch a promptnefs, bringing him fuch a return from thence as he could with, he took the first occasion (before he was fo much as fufpected) to give his party caufe to believe, that he meant not to venture himfelf in their bottom. As foon as there was an occafion, by the address of a great number of ministers by way of propolition, to reform many particulars both in the doctrine and discipline of the church, he discovered his diflike of those defigns, and the pirit that produced them, very warmly; and becaufe it was well known that many of those ministers had had frequent communication with him, and even confulted that very addrefs by his confent and approbation, he took notice of it himfelf, and feemed much offended that they had infifted upon many particulars which he had difallowed; and fo mentioned fome particular expressions that had passed between them, and which offended more perfons than had been privy to the conferences, and looked like a difcovery of future projections which were not yet ripe. In the public profecution of the Earl of Strafford he continued still in the fame conjunction, and kept his post amongst those who were to manage the evidence against him, but with fuch a temper (which could not be reafonably excepted againft) that manifelted enough, that he neither brought the fpirit, nor would bring the testimony they expected from him, and as foon as the trial was over, and it was difeerned that the house of peers would not take upon them the condemning the Earl, but that it would be necessary to pass an act of Parliament to that purpole, the bill was no fooner brought into the house of commons, but he appeared most violently against it, difcovered many particulars which had passed in their most private conferences, which he faid had first perplexed him; and enlarged fo pathetically upon the whole matter, and against the condemning of the Earl, that that whole party had fo great a detestation of him, that they had not lefs appetite to deftroy him, than the Earl of Strafford. And this contest produced another difcovery, that a very important paper, which had been produced and perufed in the clofe committee, and upon which they principally depended for making good their charge, had been taken away, and could never afterwards be found ; and it was confidently alleged, that at the time when that paper was laft feen, and lay upon the table in Mr. Pym's chamber, there were only three perfons prefent, whereof he was.

was one. This produced an order in the houle that every one of that close committee, who were about eight, thould make a folenin proteflation in the houfe, that he neither had that paper, nor knew what became of it. Which test he cheerfully fubmitted to, with the most folemn and bitter execrations that can be imagined, upon himfelf and his family, if he knew what was become of that paper, or if he had ever taken it away ; notwithstanding which, they who were angry with him did not believe him, and confidently reported, that it was found afterwards amongst fome papers of his which were taken in the house of his father in the war; which is not probable, fince it may be prefumed that a man who had gotten it in fuch a manner, would at leaft, after fuch an enquiry was made upon it, have caft it into the fire, though there was not then any fufpicion that fuch an action could ever have produced it.

However it was the inconvenience of that difcovery, produced by the furreption of that paper, that it produced many other notable difcoveries with it, which were all caft upon his accompt, who was looked upon as a deferter at least, if not a betrayer of his party; and fo from us great an height of applaufe, and even adoration, which he had attained to by Christmas, before Eafter he was fallen to fo low an efteem with all that people, that they thought no reproach equal to his demerit, and profecuted him accordingly with their utmost animofity and rage. The truth is, he had a wonderful, and a very extraordinary facility throughout the whole courfe of his life, to arrive fooner to a great pitch of effeem and being beloved, than any man I ever knews and then would make the greatest haste, to fall from that estimation into a gulph of prejudice and detestation, which can be imagined; which wrought the unufual effect. that he had fcarce a notable enemy throughout his life, with whom he had not held a very great friendship, or at least profest such an inclination to, which, in any other man, would have amounted to a friendship, and he bore both the extremes very unconcernedly, imputing the first to his own virtue, and transcendant parts, and his dexterity in managing them; and the latter, to the unfteadinefs and inconftancy of other men's humours, to their envy and jealoufy of his mafter faculties.

He was now compelled to tranfplant himfelf into the court, when the foil was neither fo fruitful, nor the air fo pleafant as it had formerly been; indeed, where a nipping froft had induced a marvellous fterility, and in this too his conftitation was fo happy that he found a confolation for himfelf, and induftrioufly imputed that to his generofity and election, which other men thought to be the effect of his neceffity, and that he could grow no where elfe, when he endeavoured to grow there. It was a very melancholy feation there, where most of those who had received the greatest obligations from their mafter, and were most able to have done him fervice, not only forfook him, but betrayed him; and in order to getting credit with those who suppressed all other authority, they discovered all they knew which might advance the evil defigns of the other, with whom they refolved to go thorough fharers in all that was to be gotten; and and the other few who retained ftill their fidelity and their zeal, with indignation enough to fee the backfliding of their fellows, were yet fo terrified with the power of the other, and with the perfidioufnefs that they faw every day practifed, infomuch as nothing was faid or done in the most fecret places of the court, even by the king or queen themfelves, but it was communicated to those who had no modesty in the confidering it, but impudently declared that they would remove all perfons from the king and queen, whofe very looks were not grateful to them, of which they had already given many inftances. So that they, who, I fay, wanted not faith, were yet without skill to forefee what they were to do, and the king himfelf found his infelicity to be fo monflrous, that he knew not with whom to advife, nor in truth whom to truft; for they, who had no mind to betray him, were betrayed themfelves, and out of their trufting others, made them acceffary to the betraying him. In this conjuncture, the vivacity of fuch a perion could not but be very acceptable, who had a brain perpetually working, and a conception and understanding deliberating and refolving together, and a courage fo keen and fearlefs, that he was ready to execute the fame minute whatfoever was refolved. The truth is,

Si duos prætereatales Idæa tulifiet Terra viros

God only knows what might, or might not have refulted from his bold temper; when the party, that did all the mifchief, was made up of those whose despair of being fase any where else, and belief that the king would yield to any thing that should be confidently demanded, had thrown into that ftronger fide. He could no longer act upon the ftage where he had fo long flourished, and where his mercurial temper was not grateful, even to those to whom the violence and ill defigns of the others was visible, and equally odious; fo that he was called up by writ to the house of peers, as at to move in that fphere, where he no fooner came than he gave fresh life and vigour to it, the real temper of that house retaining a vigorous affection to the king, church, and government, and contequently very inclined to follow his example, and to be fwayed by his reafon, who always delivered himfelf with notable advantage, and was now known to be trufted by the court, and fo like to carry on their defigns in the method preferibed there, and where he was looked upon, not as having deferted his principles or his party, but as a prudent difeoverer of their exorbibitant defigns contrary to the principles they owned, and had fo retired himfelf from their dangerous converfation and loft their confidence. becaufe he would not part with his innocence. And truly, if the too great activity and rettlefsnefs of his nature would have given him leave to have fat flill, and expected, and made use of those advantages, which the hafty and choleric humour of the houfe of commons was ready every day to prefent to them, and which temper was the utmost extent of courage the house of peers could be carried to, which did not yet lufpett the defigns of the world men to be fo monitrous as they fliorily after appeared to be, it is very probable. the wifdom and temper of the one houfe, with the concurrence it would have found from the major part of the other, which way far from l.e. ing

ing corrupted, would have prevented those calamities, which, under the fpecious authority of the parliament, were afterwards brought upon the kingdom. But his nature was impatient of fuch repofe, and he always embraced those counfels which were boldest and most hazardous, which he thought would give a greater luftre to his wit and conduct. And this unhappy infirmity and vanity made him always referved to those with whom he most intimately confulted, and without whofe concurrence he pretended to refolve nothing. Yet in any determination that was ever made between them, he always referved fome fuch important particular to himfelf, which would in truth have changed the whole council, and have made them all proteft against that which he refolved to have done, as a matter mutually adjusted between them ; which he did not do out of jealoufy and diffrust of the other, or a contradiction of their opinions and judgment, which he was ftill most ready to comply with, and was upon any debate the most easily perfuaded to depart from his own inclinations of any man I ever knew of fuch a talent in understanding: but the other refervation proceeded only, first, from an opinion that if he should communicate it, it would find a general approbation (as he was very indulgent to himfelf in believing that what appeared reafon to him, . would appear fo to every body elfe) and then the referving it would keep fomewhat for credit and reputation to himfelf, which was unthought of by the reft; and by this unlucky temper in his nature, many defperate inconveniences felt out to the king and to himfelf, which would have confounded any other man in himfelf, as well as with others. But fuch accidents were fo far from making fuch impreffion upon him, that he was the more ready to embrace a new enterprize, when the old mifcarried, and was the only man I ever knew of fuch incomparable parts, that was never the wifer for any experience or misfortune which befell him; but was as ready to take the fame measures, and pursue the fame expedients, often times to employ the fame perfons by which that miscarriage and those misfortunes had befalien him, which proceeded from a notable fagacity and confidence in himfelf, towards whom he never could entertain the least jealoufy. This inconvenient prefumption was the longer from being difcovered or taken notice of, except by a few of his most intimate friends, by the wonderful faculty he had of diffimulation, which was fo profound that he appeared the most offended and enraged when he faw any thing done that was notorioufly difliked, and bitterly inveighed against the authors of those counfels which himfelf alone had contrived, and to the execution whereof no man elfe was privy. So when he had prevailed with the king to caufe the fix members to be accufed, and had undertaken to caufe them to be committed, when he found in the houfe of peers the general difapprobation and diflike of it, he flood himfelf up and fpake against it, and whilpered the lord Mandeville in the ear, that the king would be undone if he did not publicly difcover those who had given him that counfel, and that he would immediately go to the court and difpose him to it; when he alone was the only man, who, without communicating it to any other, had advised that profecution, named all7

all the perfons, and promifed the king to bring in ample teffimony and evidence against them; and all this in a feafon when the king's affairs were in fo good a poilure, that there was no need of fuch a defperate remedy, and when the heart of the contrary party was fo near broken, that they needed fuch an expedient to keep up their credit and ability to do further mifchief. And therefore many fober men detefted that advice as the most visible introtroduction to all the mifery that afterwards befel the king and kingdom. Yet his great ipirit was fo far from failing, that when he faw the whole city upon the matter in arms to defend them, knowing in what house they were together, he offered the king, with a felect number of a dozen gentlemen, who, he prefumed would flick to him, to teize upon their perfons, dead or alive, and without doubt he would have done it, which must likewife have had a wonderful effect. Bat that counfel being rejected, and finding his credit abated in all places, he transported himself out of the kingdom, and was fhortly after, by a wonderful retaliation of providence, and in the fame method of contempt, which he had caufed to be practifed towards the other, (by publishing a proclamation to reftrain them from going out of the kingdom, when he knew they were together in London, and environed with a firength and power enough to drive the king himfelf from Whitehall, as they ihortly " did) accufed of high treaton, upon the most flight and trivial fuggestions, and a proclamation iffued out for his apprehenfion; all which would have brought another man to make ferious reflections upon himfelf, and extinguished that inordidute heat of Vol. XXVIII.

brain and fancy, which had fo often transported him to unreasonable and unprofperous refolations. But all this nothing allayed that flame, or extinguished that fire in him, but as foon as the war broke out, or rather, as foon as there was any appearance of it, he re-transported himfelf again into England, raifed a regiment of horfs, and charged in the head of it at the battle of Edgehill with as much courage as any man, and afterwards marched with prince Rupert towards the north : and in the way, finding the close in the city of Litchfield garrifoned by the rebels, and fecured by a frong old wall and a mote, and the prince refolving to reduce it, he cauled his foot to florm it, which being beaten off, and indeed not being fufficient in number to make fuch a general affault as was neceffary, the other, to encourage the officers of the horfe to make an attempt in another place, offered himfelf to go ac the head of them, and fo led them through the mote to another part of the wall which was thought to be weaker; by means whereoi, and the garrifon within being divided into feveral quarters, the foot entered the place, and made themfelves mafter of it with great difficulty, and with great lofs, and very many of the horle officers who entered by the mote were killed, and the refbeaten off, himfelf being in the mud to the middle, and thot through the thigh with a multimet bullet, was wonderfully brought of, and afterwards recovered his wounds; bat not finding that respect from the prince which he had promifed himfelf, he gave up his regiment of horie, and retired to the court, where he was fure to find good constenance.

It hath been obferved in mee, that the perion of whom we diffourfe leal fo rare a composition by nature had by ait, for nature alone could never have reached to it, that he was to or from ever being difinated (and greater variety of misfortune never befel any man) upon any misfortune, that he quickly recollected hindelf to vigorously, that he did really believe his condition improved by that id accident, and that he had an opportunity thereby to gain a new flock of reputation and honour; and fo, he no fooner found. himfelf in Ireland (when that kingdom was in the greatest distraction imaginable by the perfidiousness of the Irifh, who having made a peace with the marquis of Ormond, the king's lieutenant for that kingdom, and within a few days renounced and broke it again) but he believed he was upon a flage where he fhould act wonders, and unite all the divided affections, and all the diffinct interefts, and make them all jubfervient to the hing. The quarrel was religion, which had transported both parties to the etmost outrages of blood and animofity, which can refult from that unhappy fpring; and thrugh the follower part of the nation CE really and conferentioufly cuttre to return to their allegiance, and han this upon prevailed fo far Whith their general council, anat they hal conferred to a peace, as is faid Letters, and which was accordingly published ; yet the molignant party was to much fuperior and prevalent, that within few days they cancelled all that was done, impriloned the principal perfons who had contriluted to that peace, and put the managery of their whole affairs into the hands of men of another temper. and committed the whole nation, and and as much of the kingdom as they could difpose of, to the entire protection and disposal of the pope, in the perfon of his nuncio, Rinuccini, whom he had lately fent thither, with a very large fapply of arms and ammunition, to interrupt their fubmission to the king. He was a man of a haughty and phantailical humour and nature, with a perplexed understanding; all his faculties being difpoled principally to make eaty things hard, and to create intricacies out of the molt clear and manifest confultations. This was the condition and posture that Ireland was in when this gentleman arrived there, the whole kingdom being fo near reduced to the obedience of the nuncio, that he feemed to have nothing to do, but to fhut up the lord lieutenant in Dublin, till he could by a clofer fiege likewife fubdue that capital city, and in order thereunto, he was drawing together an army from all the quarters of the kingdom. This was now a fcene fit for the other's activity, and being received very kindly by the lord lieutenant, out of respect to his perfon, and the character he had under the king, he quickly took upon him to fay any thing in the king's name, which the lord lieutenant believed (for he was fleered by him) might contribute to his majerity's fervice in a time of fo great jealoufy. About the fame time an express arrived from Scilly, who was fent thence to the lord lieutenant from the prince of Wales, to inform his lordship, that his highness was newly retired to that island, where he meant to refide as long as he should find it convenient; and becaufe the illand was poor, and unfurnished with men, his highness wished that he might have a hundred men fent him, with good officers for a guard to his perfon; having fent at the fame time to his royal mother the queen, who was then at Paris, to procure him money from thence for the fupport of his perfon and the payment of the foldiers. This news came no fooner to Dublin, but the perfon we mentioned prefently conceived that the prince's prefence in Ireland would fettle and compose all the factions there, reduce the kingdom to his majely's fervice, and oblige the pope's nuncio, who was an enemy to the peace, to guit his ambitious defigns. The lord lieutenant had fo good an opinion of that expedient, that he could have been very well contented, that, when his highnefs had been forced to leave England, he had rather chofen to have made Ireland than Scilly his retreat; but being a wife man, and having many difficulties before him in view, and the apprehension of many contingencies which might increase those difficulties, he would not take upon him to give advice in a point of fo great importance; but forthwith, having a couple of frigates ready, he cauled a hundred men with their officers to be presently put on beard, according to his highness's defire, and the lord Digby (who always concluded that that was fit to be done, which his first thoughts suggested to him, and never d mbted the execution of any thing which he once thought fit to be attempted) put himfelf on board thefe veffels, refolving that upon the ftrength of his own reason he fhould be able to perfuade the prince, and the council which attended him, forthwith to quit Scilly and to repair to Dublin; which h- did not doubt nlight be brought to pafe in that way that would have been gr. thial to the lord lieutenant. The prince within 62 a feita forthight after his coming to Scil-Iv, which was in March, found the place not to firong as he had underflood it to be, that the ifland was very poor, and that he should not be able to draw any provisions thither from Cornwall, by which commerce those illands had flill been topported, he refolved therefore, betore the year advanced further, when the feaswere like to be more infelted with the enemy's thips, to tranfport himfelf to Jerfey, which he did very happily, and tound it to be a place in all respects very fit to relide in, till he might better underftand the prefent condition of England, and receive fome politive advice from the king his father .---But by this fudden remove of the ornice from Scilly, the two frigates from Dublin mitted finding him there, and the lord, whole order they were obliged to observe, made all the hafte he could to Jerfoy, where he arrived well, and found the prince there with many other of his friends who attended his highnefs; the two lords being gone but the day before to attend the queen. He lost no time in informing his highnels of the happy flate and cond tion of Ireland, that the peace was concluded, and an army of twelve thouland men ready to be transported into England, of the grou zeal and affection the lord Tieutenant had for his fervice, and that if his highness would repair thither he thould find the whole kingdom devoted to his fervice; and thereupon pofitively advifed him, without further deliberation, to put himfelf choard those frigates, which were excellent failers, and fit for his fecure transportation. The prince told him that it was a matter of greater importance than was fit to be executed upon fo flort deliberation; that he no fooner arrived at Jerfey than he received letters from the queen his mother, requiring him forthwith to come to Paris where all things were provided for his reception ; that he had fent two of the lords of the council 'o the queen, to excufe him for not giving ready obedience to her commands, and to affure her that he was in a place of unqueftionable fecurity, in which he might fafely expect to hear from the king his father before he took any other refolution. That it would be very incongruous now to remove from thence, and to go into Ireland before his meffengers returned from Paris, in which time he might reafonably hope to hear from the king himfelf, and fo wished him to have patience till the matter was more ripe for a determination. This reafonable answer gave him no fatisfaction : he commended the prince's averseness from going into France, which he faid was the most pernicious counfel that ever could be given, that it was a thing the king his father abhorred, and never could confent to; and that he would take upon himself to write to the queen, and to give her such folid advice and reasons that should infallibly convert her from that defire, and that should abundantly fatisfy her that his going into Ireland was abfolutely neceffary; but that a little delay in the execution of it might deprive them of all the fruit which was to be expected from that journey, and therefore renewed his advice and importunity for lofing no more time, but immediately to end bark. Which when he faw was not like to prevail with his highnefs, he immediately repaired to one of those of the privy conncil who attended tended the prince, with whom he had a particular friendship, and lamented to him the lofs of fuch an occafion, which would inevitably reftore the king, who would be equally ruined if the prince went into France, of which he fpake with all the deteftation imaginable, and faid, he was fo far fatisfied in his confeience of the benefit that would redound from the one, and the ruin which would inevitably fall out by the other, that he faid, if the perfon with whom he held this conference would concur with him, he would carry the prince into Ireland even without, and against his confent. The other perfon answered that it was not to be attempted without his confent, nor could he imagine it poffible to bring it to pafs if they should both endeavour it; he replied, that he would invite the prince on board the frigates to a collation, and that he knew well he could fo commend the vefiels to him, that his own enrichty would eafily invite him to a view of them, and that as foon as he was on board, he would caufe the fails to be holited up, and make no stay till he came into Ireland. The other was very angry with him for entertaining fuch imaginations, and told bim they neither agreed with his wifdom nor his duty, and left him in defpair of his conjunction, and at the fame time of being able to compais it. He had no fooner difcharged himfelf of this imagination, but in the instant (as he had a most pregnant fancy) he entertained another with the fame vigour, and refolved with all poffible expedition to find himfelf at Paris, not making the leaft queftion but that he foould convert the queen from any further thought of fending for the prince into France, and as eafily obtain her confent and approbation for his repairing into Ireland; and he made as little doubt, with the queen's help, and by his own dexterity, to prevail with France to fend a good supply of money by him into Ireland, by which he fhould acquire a moft univerfal reputation, and be the most welcome man alive to the lord lieutenant; and transported with this happy auguration he left Jerfey, leaving at the fame time his two fhips and his foldiers, and half a dozen gentlemen of quality, who, upon his defire and many promiles, had kept him company from lreland, without one penny of money to fubilit upon during his abfence.

As foon as he came to Paris and had feen the queen, whom he found very well inclined to do all fhe could for the relief of Ireland, but refolute to have the prince her fon immediately with her, notwithflanding all the reafons prefied against it by the lords of the king's council who had been fent from Jersey, he attended the cardinal, who underflood him very well and knew his foible. He received him with all the ceremony and demonstration of refpect he could possibly express, entered upon the difcourie of England, and celebrated the part which he had acted upon that itage in fo many actions of courage and fagacity, of the highest prudence and cir. cumfpection, with an indefatigable induitry and fidelity; he told him that France found too late their own error, that they had been well content to fee the king's great puillance weakened by his domeilic troubles, which they withed only thould licep him from being able to hurt his neighbours, but that they hever and de an el C3

defired to fee him at the mercy of his own rebels, which they faw now was like to be the cafe, and they were therefore refolved to wed his interest in fuch a way and manner as the queen of England should deire, in which he well knew how much her majetty would depend upon his couniel. He faid it was abfolutely neceffary, fince the crown of France refolved to wed the king's interest, that the person of the prince of Wales flould refide in France; that the method he had thought of proceeding in was, that the queen of England thould make choice of fuch a perfon whom the thought best affected, and beit qualified for fuch an employment, whom the king would immediately fend as his extraordinary ambaffudor to the king an to the parliament; that he focul a give a himfelf sholly by fuch inductions a the outen fhould give him, which he knew would be his work to prepare; that all things should be mide ready as foon as the queen would nominate the ambaffador; and that upon the arrival of the prince of Wales in any part of France, as fcon as notice fhould be fent to the court of it, for which due preparation fhould be made, the ambaffador thould be in the fame manner difpatched for England, with one only inftruction from France, which thould be, 1 hat he fhould demand a fpeedy answer from the parliament, whether they would fatisfy the demands he had made; which if they fhould refuse to do, he fhould forthwith in the king his mafter's name declare a war against them, and immediately leave the kingdom and return home, and then there fhould be quickly fuch an army ready as was worthy for the prince of Wales to venture his own perfon in, and that he fhould have the honour to redeem and reflere his father. This difcourfe ended. he wanted not language to extol the generofity and the magnanimity of the refolution. and to pay the cardinal all his compliments in his own coin, and from thence to enter upon the condition of Ireland, in which the cardinal prefently interrupted him, and told him he knew well he was come from thence, and meant to return thither, and likewife the carriage of the nuncio; that the marquis of Ormond was too brave a gentleman, and had merited too much of his mafter, to be deferted, and France was refolved not to do it's bufinefs by halves, but to give the king's affairs an entire relief in all places, that he should carry a good fupply of money with him into Ireland, and that arms and ammunition fhould be freedily fent after him, and fuch direction to their agent there as should draw off all the Irish from the nancio, who had not entirely given themfelves up to the Spanish interest.

Ine noble perion had that which he most defired, he was prefently converted, and undertook to the queen that he would prefently convert all at Jerfey, and that the prince should obey all her commands, and entered into confultation with her upon the election of an ambaffador, and what inftructions should be prepared for him, which he took upon himfelf to prepare. Monfieur Bellievre was named by the queen, whom the cardinal had defigned for that office ; the cardinal approved the instructions, and caufed fix thousand pistoles to be paid to him who was to go to Ireland; and though it was a much lefs lefs fum than he had promifed himfelf, from the magnificent expressions the cardinal had used to him, vet it provided well for his own cccafions. So he left the queen with his ufual professions and confidence, and accompanied those lords to Jerfey, who were to attend upon his highnels with her majefly's orders for the prince's repair into France, for the advancement whereof the cardinal was fo folicitous, that he writ a letter to the old prince of Conde, which he knew he would forthwith fend to the queen, as he did; in which he faid that he had received very certain advertifement out of England, that there were fome perfons about the prince of Wales in Jerfey, who had undertaken to deliver his highnets up into the hands of the parliament for twenty thousand piftoles, and this letter was forthwith fent by the queen to overtake the lords, that it might be fhewed to the prince, and that they who attended upon him might difeern, what would be thought of them, if they diffuaded his highnefs from giving a prefent obedience to his mother's commands. As foon as they came to Jerfey, he used all the means he could to perfuade his friend to concur in his advice for the prince's immediate repair into France ; he told him of all that had passed between the cardinal and him, not leaving out any of the expressions of the high value his eminence had of his particular perfon; that an ambaffador was chofen by his advice, and his inftructions drawn by him, from no part of which the ambaffador durft fwerve, and, which is very wonderful, he did really believe for that time, that he had both nominated the ambaffador, and that his infractions would be enactly obferved by him (ib great a power he had always over himielf, that he could believe any thing which was grateful to him); that a war would be prefently proclaimed upon their refuial to de what the ambaliador required; and that there wanted nothing to the expediting this great affair but the prince . immediate repairing into France without further delay, there being no other question concerning that matter, than whether his highnets thould flay in Jerfey, where this could be no queition of his recurice, until he could receive exprets di-rection from the king his lather; and therefore he conjured his friend to concur in that advice, which would be very grateful to the queen, and be attended with much belieft to himfelf; telling him how kind her majely was to him, and how confident the way of his fervice, and that if he fhould be of another opinion, it would not hinder the Prince from going, who he knew was refolve I to obey his Mother ; and 10 concluded his difcourfe with tacted arguments which he thought were like to make most impression by him, and gave him the instructions by which the ambailidor was to be guided. His friend, who in truth loved him very heartily, thou h no man better knew his infirmities, told him, whatever the prince would be disposed to do, he could not change his opinion in point of course fel, until the King's pleature might be known ; he put him in mind how he had been before deceived at OAford by the comte de Haresurt, who was an ambaflador likewile, as was then thought, named by curfelves, and whole influctions he had likewile drawn, and yet he could hut not but well remember how foully that bufind's had been minaged, and how dubbligingly himfelf had been neated by that ambaffador; and therefore he could not but wonder that the fame artifices fhould again prevail with him, and that he cculd imagine that the inftructions he had drawn would be at all confidered or purfued, further than they might contribute to what the cardinal for the prefent defigned; of the integrity whereof they had no evidence, but had reafon enough to falpect. And fo neither's perluafions working upon the other, the prince fhortly removed into France, and he purfued his journey for Ireland with as much of the French money as was left, whereof the lord licutenant never received one thoufand pistoles towards the support of his majefty's affairs.

When he landed in Ireland, he found the whole treaty of peace difavowed and made void by the Irith, under the command of the nuncio, who was declared both treneral at land and admiral at fea of that kingdom. Here was a new field for action, which this perfor prefently entered into, male a journey upon very little encouragement or fecurity in his own perion to the nuncio, was received and entertained by him very rudely, till he found it necessary, with great difficulty, to make what halle he could again to Dublin, where he continued to have many imaginations of uniting parties, and dividing the Irish amongh themfelves, until he plainly difcerned that there was no way left to preferve that kingdom from being irrecoverably loft to the crown, but by putting it into the hands of the parliament, which still made profellor of all duty to the king; and when that was unavoidably to be done, and the commissioners from the parliament arrived to receive it, he found means again to transport himfelf into France, where he immediately found himfelf engaged in feveral quartels upon the account of what had formerly passed in England, which without any kind of foruple he appeared ready to aniwer with his foord in his hand, his courage having always faithfully feconded him in all his defigns. When these contells were over, he repaired again to his new friend the cardinal, who received him not with the effection he formerly had done, and only as a man who had propofed to himfelf to live upon them; yet he gave him very good words, promifed him fome command in the army, he proposing to himself no other course of life for his fulfiftence and preferment, than in the war; and in the mean time gave him a very mean supply for his prefent subfissence, nor did le and any better reception from those of whom he expected to be admitted as a full flarer in all they enjoyed. This mortification would have broken any other man's spirits, but it gave him only fome fits of indignation, without working in the leaft degree upon the vigour of his mind, refolving to take the first opportunity to make himfelf to be more confidered, and an opportunity thorthy offered itself, which could have hardly been propitious to any man born under another confletiation.

The diforders of Paris had forceil the king to retire from thence to St. Germains, and all evertures towards accommodation being hopelefs, forces were raifed on both fides, fome of the princes of the blood being in the head of thole in Paris,

Paris, and others with the king; and when both armies were one day drawn up at a small diftance from each other, the perfon we are difcouring of, having with fome difficulty procured a horfe, had put himielf as a volunteer into the king's troops, and a perfon of the other file coming out fingle out of the troops in a bravado to change a piftel (as the phrafe is) with any fingle man who should be willing to encounter him, he, without speaking to any body, moved his horfe very leifurely towards him, the other feeming to fland flill and expect him, but he did in truth dexteroufly retire fo near his own troops, that before the time he could come to charge him, the whole front of that fquadron difcharged all their carbines upon him, whilft the other retired into his place. By this difhonourable proceeding, he received a fliot in the thigh with a brace of bullets, and keeping full his horfe, needed no excufe for making what hafte he could back, when he could no longer fit his horfe. This action being performed fo gallantly in the view of the king, the cardinal, and the prince of Condè, all men enquired who the gentleman was, and very few knew more than that he was an Englishman; but his name was quickly known and published, and direction given for his accommodation and recovery, in fuch a manner, as expressed that the king thought himfelf concerned that he fhould want nothing, and from this action and accident he made another glorious flight into the world, for he was no fooner recovered of his wounds, and went to make his acknowledgment to the king and the cardinal, but he found the cardinal's countenance very ferene towards him, and himfelf quickly poffefied of an honourable command of horfe, with fuch liberal appointments as made his condition very eafy, the Cardinal taking all occafions to do him honour, and he very well knowing how to cultivate those inclinations.

If he had been born to be happy, or had had a temper to have received the approaches of good fortune, when the made most hafte towards him, no man had ever prepared fuch as afcent to himfelf to any height he could propose; he was the discourse of the whole court. and had drawn the eves of all men upon him; his quality, his education, the handfomenets of his perion, and even the beauty of his countenance (being not at that time above thirty years of age, and looking much younger) his alacrity and hercenefs in action against the enemy, his foftness and civility in all kind of converfations, his profound knowledge in all kind of learning, and in all languages, in which he enlarged or refrained himfelf, as he faw opportunity, made him grateful to all kind of perfons. His first treep of herie confisted most of English, who reforted to him in as great numbers as he could wish, and who thought their fortunes made by their dependance upon him; and he was well contented they fhould do fo, not concealing any imagination of his own of the vaft height his ftars would carry him to, imputing fill all fuccels to his own rare contrivance, and dexterity in the management, and encouraged them to hope all for fortunes under his conduct, which brought great joy and fatisfaction to them both : they, congratulating with themfelves for the great bleffing fing that had befallen, that they had committed their fortunes into the hands of a perion who could fo eafily, and was relolved to amply to provide for them, and fo they celebrated him in all places as the wonder of the world; and he, too much delighting in that kind of celebration, requited them only in giving them equal tellimony as brave men, e.n.llent officers, who having the choice of all offices and preferments, made it their choice, cut of their mere love and encem of his perion, to grow up under his fladow, and in the mean time that they would wait with patience and indultry, that they might take their turn with him. But patience and industry were virtues that neither of them were acquainted with, they were pleafed with him becaufe his profestions and promises were very early, and fo like preferments, that they concluded, that he that faid more than they could with in the first and fecond weeks, would give them possession of fomething within three or four months. And he again believed that all their professions and zeal proceeded purely out of an innate affection to his perfon, would never be wearv of their dependance, or that he flouid fill be able to keep it warm with the fame fire by which he had kindled it. So that they being men of licence and expence, who expected prefent liberal fupport, he having given them caufe to expect much more, and he having not in his nature the leaft inclination to bounty or generofity, they grew quickly wearv of each other, they abandoning him as a perion who promifed vailly, lightly, and unreafonably, and who would not perform, if it were in his power to do it as eafily as to promife; and he looking upon it as a great advancement to his fortune to be freed from tach an importanate and infadiable dependance. When he made his fait corner for his troop, his imprefs was an oftrich, which is his own creft, and in its mouth a piece of iron, under it, these words, Ferro wiwendum of tibi, quid prastantia plumæ?-alloding to the nature of the offrich to live upon iron, which was now his fortune to do, without any benefit from the beauty on her feathers, as he was to expect none from the luftre of his pen, in which he believed he excelled all men. The invention had fharpnefs in it, and added to his reputation, even when it appeared to be full blown.

Whilft the civil wars of France continued, and every day difcovered treachery and falfehood in the court, amongit those who were least fuspected, his credit grew to that degree, both with the queen and the cardinal, that he was admitted into the greatest trust, and was in truth ready for the boldeit undertakings, in which he had fometime fuccets, which he never forgot, but he never remembered want of it, or when he had fucceeded very ill; and was as prepared for any new undertaking. And in truth, the changes he met with, and even the reparations he fometimes received, might well work upon a nature lefs fanguine than his. Upon the king's first coming to Paris after the murther of his father, at which time he ftood possessed of the office of fecretary of state, he had some very good friends about the young king, who did wifh that he might receive all gracious treatment from his majesty, as a man who had behaved himfelf faithfully and fignally in the the fervice of his father, and being of that rank and quality as had feldom received any diminution upon the fuccellion of the crown. But his majefty very quickly difcovered fuch an averfion for him, that he did not receive him with any degree of grace, nor admit him into any kind of confultation, there being fome perfons of inferior condition about him who had made it their bufinefs to make the worft impreffion they could of him, principally infusing into him, that he was the moft obnoxious perfon in England, and the most ingrateful to all degrees of perfons, and therefore his Majesty could not do a more unpopular thing than to receive fuch a perfon into any kind of credit with him. These and the like infusions prevailed fo far, as that an obftinate averfion was too eafily difcovered by those who stood very near, and he himself discerned it soon enough not to expole himfelf till it was differned by others at a farther diftance ; and therefore he fpeedily withdrew himfelf from any further attendance, and retired to his command in the army, where he grew every day, and where he pleafed himfelf with the having discharged his duty in the overtare of his fervice, and as much, that that overture was rejected, the acceptance whereof might have made him lefs folicitous to have profecuted his fortune, which providence had laid before him, in a more specious way. And in his refentments of this kind he was naturally very sharp and flowing, let the perfons be of what quality foever which were to be mentioned upon those occasions; and yet within two or three years, together with the progress he made in the war, he recovered to much credit with the perfon of the king, by his own pure addrefs and dexterity, that he not only made himfelf acceptable to him in conversation, but fo gracious, that he made him knight of the order, which was the greatest honour he could beslew, and the most useful to the perfon on whom he beftowed it. And here he again congratulated his flars for the neglect and affront he had formerly fuftained, and his own genius for the honour and reparation he had wrought out for himiclf by his wifdom in supporting it; and at the time when he had this obligation conferred upon him, the king was at the Louvre with his mother, and the city of Paris, with many of the princes, in rebeilion. Whilit the king and his army were about St. Germains, he frankly undertook, by his pretence to pay his duty to the king, that he would introduce officers and men enough to policis himself of the Louvre, where the king was in great jealoufy and unibrage with the princes and the city; and when the execution of this defign was by fome accident interrupted, he never thought he owed an apology to the king for engaging in fuch an enterprize, in which his perfon and his honour was to be fo much concerned, without to much as communicating it to himfelf; but would with all affurance declare, that he ought not to let the king know of it, becaufe it could not be prefumed be would confent to it, and then it would be in his power to prevent it; and therefore it ought to be done without his privity, which would abfolve him from being thought to have a hand in it, and the advantage would be fo great to the king of France's fervice, and his own glory in the luftre of fuch an an action, that he was obliged in honour to undertalie it.

His commands now were grown fo confiderable, not only in point of honour, but in point of profit (the greatest part of the trade to Paris being driven under his passes and licence, he having the command of those rivers by which they were to have their entrance) that it was concluded by all men, that he would in a very thort time raife a very great estate to himself, it being evident enough that he never difpenied with, or remitted the leaft fum of money which he could exact; that he never made expence in eating or drinking; never had any expence in equipage; never exercifed any thing of bounty towards friend, tervant or dependant, and as little charity towards any perion who flend in want of relief, of which he had worthy objects enough in many distrefied perfons of his own country; yet (which is the most wonderful part of his life) he was not only always without money, but without those supplies of linen and clothes which all men were poffeifed of who ferved in a much inferior condition; all which (for it was notorious to all) men then imputed to his excefs in play and gaming, in which he was exceedingly delighted, and always over-reached, for he played not well; and to fome amours in which he had always the vanity to involve himfelf, and to which he might poffibly make fome facrifices for that vanity's fake. It is very true he was in his conflication, and as much in his nature, very umorous; and whether to exercise that part of his oratory, which he thought graceful and powerful in making love, or for the natural effects of it, he was very feldom without fuch a deity to facrifice to, which he always performed fo industriously, that he feemed to neglect all other things of the world. He would admire and extol the perfon he adored beyond what any of the poets had uled to do, and then grieve and lament, and bewail his own want of merit. and unworthinefs, even in tears, at his mistres's feet, making all the promifes and vows imaginable, and would procure letters of his wife's desperate fickness of some disease that could not be cured, nor fupported above two, or three months, and thereupon make offers and promiles of marriage with the fame importunity as if the time were ready for contract; and when either fuccefs, or want of fuccefs, had put an end to, or allayed the forvour of these addresses, he was as ready and folicitous in any new embarkation, and would act as romantic exploits as are recited in any of the romances. Whilft he was a votary to a lady of noble extraction and incomparable beauty in Paris, it happened that a young abbot frequented the fame houfe, and found his prefence lefs agreeable than he had formerly thought it had been, and had thereupon used fome expreflions, according to the cuffom and liberty of that nation and that people, which the lady thought herfelf difobliged by, and complained of it to many perfons of quality who used to be in her prefence. This noble lover being once well informed where the abbot was, and what journey he intended to make, fent an officer that he could truft with fome borie and took him prifoner, and fent him to the lady with a letter, that if he made not an entire and humble latisfaction to her for his mifcarriage, he had appointed the gu rá guard to bring him to him, and he fhould thereupon do fuch further juffice as was fit. The lady was infinitely furprifed and fcandalized with the reparation, caufed the abbot immediately to be difmiffed, without feeing him, and fignified her defire to the officer that his fuperior would meddle no more in her interest, or any thing relating to her reputation; and to the matter ended, with the general laughter of the court, it being in a time when greater extravagancies could not be examined and punithed. This wonderful humour continued with him to his age, and I believe will part with him laft of all his good qualities, for he is not more pleafed with any, and owns this passion, when he meets with an object worthy of his addrefs, with the fame fervour and importunity, with the fame languishing and tears, which he hath found benefit by near forty years, and therefore practifes it with the fame affurance.

When the cardinal was compelled to leave the court and the kingdom, he left this perfon in great truit with the queen, who took all occafions, by frequent conferences with him, and frequent teftimonies of his parts and abilities, to express a very good and particular efteem of him, which he (according to the kindnets he naturally had for himfelf) interpreted to proceed from his own great merit and abilities, which had rendered him very gracious to his majefty; and thereupon began to delight himfelf with the contemplation of the glorious condition he fhould be poffeffed of, if he could now fucceed the cardinal in the office of premier minister in France. And this transported him fo far, that he was not only well contented with the universal jealousy and clamour against the cardinal's return, but bare-faced took upon himfelf to advife the queen not to affect it, as a thing impoffible to be brought to pals, and that the very defiring it would expose her own fecurity to great hazard ; which the no fooner perceived (though with a countenance of grace) than fhe gave the cardinal advertifement of it, that he might incur no further inconvenience by that truft; and the other found himielf infenfibly deprived of all further opportunities to give any counfel, and was fhortly after fent with his troops into Italy in an enterprize which was not intended for fuccefs, and as foon as he returned from thence, upon protence of date, and with many compliments from the cardinal, in the affiguation of monies to be paid to him (though not half of what was in truth Jue upon his appointments) he was cafhiered of all his commands, and obliged to depart out of France, and not to return thither; leaving behind him the reputation of a very extraordinary perform, wonderfully qualified for fpeculation, but fomewhat defective in reducing those fpeculations into practice.

Magnis tamen excidit aufis.

Being now to begin the world again, he repaired into Flanders to the king, pretending that he had brought enough with him to fapport him a year, which was four times more wealth than any perfon about his majetty could pietend to, and was indeed much more than he had any view of; for within lefs than fix weeks he had fpent all that he brought from France, and therefore he bettired himfelf betime for early ways of fupply. He fluid very few days with the king at Brunels, but but the army being then in the field, and under the command of Don Juan, he repaired speedily to him. His friends, who withed him very well, defpaired that he would find any good reception there; it is corr true he had the language of a Spaniard, having been born, and lived many years in Madrid, as hath been faid before, but the gaiety of his humour, and his whole behavioar was molt contrary to the nature of Spain; befides, he had in his whole comportment, both in France and Italy, rendered himfelf very ungracious to that whole nation. Don Alonzo de Cardinas, who was in principal trait about Don Juan, had lived very many years in England, knew the other gentleman very well, and the univerfal reproach he lay under there, and how unfuccefsful his fine mercurial temper had always been in the forming any folid counfels, and therefore he was like to use all his credit to obfruct his pretences. Laftly, he had commanded a party of horie and dragoons a year or two before, in a winter expedition rpon Flanders; which was the molt ramous for plunder and all kind of rapine, and for the unnecessary conflagration of many villages and towns, that had been in that whole war. So that his name had been rendered most odious in lampoons and fongs throughout that whole province; all which, together with the Rreights and necessities the Spanish affairs at that time were in, and the infopportable poverty both of the arniy and the court at that time, would have difcouraged any other man from that application; but all this rather tharpened than abated his edge; and after he had flayed three or four days at Bruffels with the king, and entertained his majefty with variety of pleafant difcourles concerning France and Italy, efpecially the great expressions the cardinal used to him at parting, when all miftaltes were cleared and - new friendship entered into between them, he made his journey to Don Iuan, who was then with his army before Condè, without any other advantage or credit than the firength of his own genius; for he carried not with him fo much as any recommendation from the king, nor defired it. His reception at the army was with flate and refervation enough, as a man towards whom they meant to ftand upon their guard. In the mean time he, according to his natural vivacity, made all his addresses as well to the minifters and officers, as to Don Juan, as was most proper to their feveral tempers and humours, in which he prevailed fo far over Don Alonzo's own parched flupidity, and commending his great abilities in flate affairs (in which he was invincibly ignorant) that he thought he had not well enough known him before, and withed he might have credit enough with Don Juan and the Marquis Carracina, that he might be believed in the testimony he gave of him. In a very few days he had made himfelf fo acceptable to all kind of perfons, that he was generally looked upon as a very fine gentleman, and of extraordinary parts; and Don Juan himfelf was very well pleafed to fee him frequently, and efpecially at those feafons when he was most vacant to discourse, as at meals and in the evening hours, in all which feafons the other attended very diligently, entertaining him upon all subjects with very acute and refined speculations. That prince had very fine natural natural parts, and had been very converfant in many parts of polite learning, and more with books than that nation used to be, and was very much fuperior to any perfon of what quality foever who was about him, fo that he quickly made it manifest, that he was exceedingly delighted to exercife those talents in the converfation of a perion fo excellently endowed in all parts of literature. In the time Don Juan had fpent in Italy, he had been, according to the genius of that nation, inclined to examine the art of altrology, and was not without a greater opinion of it than he publicly owned. The other had really waded as deep into the examination and fludy of it as any man had done; and though he would make many pleafant difcourfes upon it, and upon the general incertitude of it, yet he had in truth a greater effeem and dependence upon it, than he was willing to be thought to have, and had many discourses of the observations he had made in Italy, of the great confidence that people had in all their affairs and counfels upon those predictions, of the fuccets whereof he would give many inflances ; and his late general the Duke of Modena had much improved his curiofity and knowledge in that feience. This argument did not only take up much of the time Don Juan fpent in public difcourfe, but difpofed him to many private conferences with him ; until in the end Don Juan defired him to examine his horofcope, which he delivered to him, and the other as willingly received, and undertook the charge : and from this kind of intercourfe, which in the beginning had no other foundation, it was upon the fudden believed that the prince held other conferences with him upon matters of greater importance, and that he had credit enough with him to prevail in many cafes. So that many perfons of all conditions applied themfelves to him, to promote their pretences to the prince, in reception whereof he was not forward; yet took care to cultivate thofe imaginations concerning his intereft in the prince, of which he intended, as he flortly after did, to make feme ufe.

When he had raifed this opinion of his parts and abilities, his next work was to manifest his interest, and the power he had to do them fervice. There were many regiments in the French army, which confifted intirely, both officers and foldiers, of Irifh, fome whereof, during his majefty's refidence in France, withdrew themfelves from the Sp2nifh fervice, declaring that they would always ferve their own king, or in fuch places as he required them. And they were now as ready to leave that crown and to engage for the Spaniard in Flanders, to which they were the more difpofed at this time, by the general rumou-(which was known to be well grounded) that the Duke of York. would be thortly obliged likewife to retire himfelf out of France, by fome oblightion the cardinal was engaged in, upon his treaty with-Croniwell; and then it was reafonably enough concluded that his royal highnefs would repair into Flanders to the king his brother, where the Duke of Gloucester already was, having found it necessary not to remain longer with his fifter in Holland, where his prefence was not grateful to those states.

The Spaniards having entered into a fecret treaty with the king, and permitted him to make his abode in Flanders,

Flanders, which was confined to the city of Bruges, rather as a prince incognito than as a king whole guarrel and interest they had wedded. As foon as they were engaged before Condè, finding that there were fome Irifn regiments in that garrifon, they feat to the king to defire him that his majefty would fend the Marquis of Ormond to the camp, to the end that by his prefence fome of the Irish in the garrifon might be wrought upon, the which his majefly conjented to, and fent the marquis accordingly, of which Don Juan found the berefit; for the jealoufy the garriton had of the Irith, made the French commander and generator treat the looner upon the furrender; and though the Lord Mutkerry, who was nephew to the Marguis of Ormond, and commanded a Broag regument of Irifh in that town, publicely refufed to bring over his regiment to the Spaniard upon the furrender of Condé, which he conceived would not be honourable for him to ao, yet he declared to his uncle, that as foon as he came into France with his men, he would repair to the court, and bare faced demand flora the cardinal a fafe conduit for lamielf and his men to march into Flandere, according to the icipulation agreed between them, I hat whenever the king fhould require his tervice, he fhould have a pais to march to him with his whole regiment; that when he had done his part, and the cardinal fhould refute to comply with his engagement, he would take himfelf to be at fall liberty, and would with all fpeed report to his majeffy, and made no donut but that his regiment would quebilly find themfelves with him, which rell con accordingly; and after the conduct had endeavoured, by all the ways he could, to dispose and perfuade him to continue in that fervice with great promifes of reward and preferment, finding at laft that he could not be wrought upon, he gave him a licence for his own departure, but refused to licence his men; faying, That they were readier for the king of England's fervice whilft they remained in France, than if they went into Flanders. Whereupon Mufkerry himfelf, with his fervants and equipage only, repaired to Bruffels, where he was received with great applaufe, both the colonel and the regiment having made themfelves very figual in very remarkable fervices; and Don Juan no fooner affigned him quarters for the reception of his men, but the whole regiment, by tens and twenties, repaired with their arms to him, infomuch that there were not above one officer and very few private foldiers who were not prefent with him, and there they continued till the making of the peace.

About the fame time, and towards the end of the campaign, there was a firong garrifon fixt and poffeffed by the French at St. Gillen, within five miles of Bruffels, under the command of Monfieur Schomburgh, who, having been poffefied thereof by the fpace of above a year, had with great pains and care made it very firong, and was a thorn in the fide of Flanders, and enceedingly diffeommoded their whole affairs. The Spaniard had attempted the furprize of it before it was thoroughly fortified, and made afterwards leveral attempts to recover it, but were always beaten off with green lof, and left hopelefs of fusceia. The major part of this garrifou year filsk, whereof most of the officers officers were of one family, and nearly allied to a gentleman who had long ferved the Marquis of Ormond in the place of a fecretary. They found means to let this gentleman know that if the king thought it would be for his fervice, they would undertake, whenever they should be required, to put it into The fecrethe Spaniard's hands. tary quickly informed his lord of the overture, and his majefty approved that the fecretary fhould refort to the army, that Don Juan might know and confider the propofition, and whether it might be practicable; and the marguis rather chofe to commit the conduct of it to the gentleman who had made himself so gracious to Don Juan, than to referve it to himfelf, his wifdom and his honour raifing many fcruples in him concerning that negociation ; and he was still unfatisfied that the benefits his majefty received from the Spaniard were not proportionable to the advantages they received from the king.

The fecretary no fooner communicated this affair to the other gentleman, but he received it with open arms, and looked upon it as a thing done which his flars had contrived for the raifing and effablishing his fortune; he made all the promifes imaginable of managing it for the particular benefit and preferment of the officers and foldiers, and then communicated it to Don Juan, as an affair that wholly depended upon him, and upon the entire dependence those officers had upon him .---The overture could not but be very grateful to Don Juan, the reduction of that place being the most defirable thing before them, and to be purchased at any price, and therefore all the conditions were readily Vol. XXVIII.

confented to, promifes made for the payment of fuch and fuch fums of money out of hand, fuch and fuch penfions to be granted upon funds which could not be difappointed, and all other things to be done for officers and foldiers which they themfelves required; and to this purpofe a treaty was entered into and figned with all requifite formalities.

This negociation was attended with other conveniencies; he had hitherto appeared only in the guality of a volunteer, which title would be at an end as foon as the army retired into their winter quarters, and he had reafon to apprehend (though there continued all fair weather in Don Juan's countenance) that the Spanish council would not be fo well pleafed to fee him frequently in the court, and in private with the prince, upon whole temper and inclinations he was already thought to have fome afcendant; but this affair of St. Gillen, which was imparted to the principal countellors, added infinitely to his reputation with them, and made his prefence at Bruffels to be even abfolutely neceffary, there being many difficulties which were in view for the execution of the defign. Schomburgh was known to be an officer of great vigilance and courage, and it was very probable that the daily refort of io many Irith into Flanders, who withdrew from the French fervice, would raife a jealoufy of all those of that nation who remained in that fervice, and therefore if the defign were not fpeedily executed, they must expect that the garrifon would be reinforced with other men, and the Irith removed; and the truth is, this was in Schomburgh's purpose from his natural jealousy of D the the inconfiancy and infidelity of that nation, without having difcovered the least circumstance of the treaty. But from the time of the taking of Condè, which administered the first fulpicion of the Irifh, it was not in his power to draw new forces to him, or to difmifs those out of his garrifon whofe company he leaft defired; thereupon he only changed one refolution he had, which was to make a journey himfelf to Paris, the knowledge and time whereof was the first ground that disposed the officers to this undertaking, as his prefence made the work the more difficult; but they were too many, and those too far engaged, to give over the defign, and therefore the officers within were as folicitous for the execution of it as the Spaniards themfelves.

In the depth of winter, about Chriftmas, in a very great froit and fnow, Don Juan affembled all his army before St. Gillen, with which Schomburgh was very much furprifed, and knew well that the army could do him no harm if his men were true to him, and therefore concluded that the enemy without depended upon treachery within, and he quickly found, by the frequent affembling of many of the Irifh officers, and by the neglect of his orders, and fometimes changing the guards, that there was a confpiracy against him, and that fome religious men had been fuffered to pafs in and out; and he intercepted one letter by which he found the lieutenant colonel of the Irifh regiment, of whom he had always had a very good opinion (and he was indeed much fuperior in abilities to that kind of people) deeply engaged in the defign, and indeed the whole conductor of it. Whereupon he Ļ caufed him fuddenly to be apprehended, with a refolution as fuddenly to execute him, but the other advifed him not to make too much hafte, and refolutely told him that his own life, and the lives of all who adhered to him, fhould explate for the lofs of his; and in the fame inftant all the Irifh betook themfelves to their arms, and poffelled themfelves of fome of the outworks, and of a place of fome ftrength in the town; and a trumpet was fent from Don Juan with a letter to the governor, in which he let him know that he was very fure of the place in fpite of all that he could do, and therefore if he should take away the lieutenant colonel's life, himfelf and all his friends fhould fuffer, but if he would prefently treat for the giving up of the place, he would give him conditions worthy of a foldier; in this Areight the governor found it abfolutely neceffary for him to treat, and quickly confented to the conditions propofed, and marched out with all those who had a mind to follow him, much the major part remaining in the Spanish fervice. And fo Don Juan returned triumphantly to Bruffels, where he was the better welcome for having reduced fo mifchievous a neighbour in the depth of winter, which they durft not have attempted in the fpring or fummer.

This action fo profperoufly carried on gave great advantage to the affairs of that country, and the dexterous conduct of it, much reputation to the perfon who had been fo inftrumental in it, who was likewife liberally confidered by the Spaniard for the fervice he had done, befides the confideration he took for himfelf out of the monies afligned for the officers and foldiers; and

and he now looked upon himfelf as fettled in the fervice of that crown, and in the particular affection of Don Juan, of which he made daily ufe. From the time of his first approach into Don Juan's good opinion, he used all the ways he could to inculcate into the king the great benefit would accrue to his fervice by the reputation he had gotten with the prince and in the Spanish councils, where he would employ all his talent and his time to promote his majefty's pretences; and therefore he proposed to the king, that he might be reftored to the character of his fecretary, as he had been to his father, and the place had never been yet disposed of, there being always two fecretaries of ftate, one of which, who had been joint officer with him, being then attending upon his majefty, and fufficient to difpatch all the business of that office. The arguments which he used to the king to gratify him in that his defire, were, that he should be thereby enabled to do his majefty great fervice by the reputation that character would give him; that he would not intermeddle with his counfels, otherwife than as his majefty should think fit to communicate them to him, in reference to the transactions which were to be made with Don Juan and in the court of Spain; that when the king fhould find it neceffary, by the advancement of his affairs in England, to difpose of the place of the fecretary to a perfon who might merit it by any notable fervice, he would willingly put it into his majesty's hands to dispose of, and betake himfelf to any other office he should be assigned to .---By these inducements he prevailed with his majefly to admit him into the fame relation he had formerly to his father, not at all meddling with the bunnels of the office, nor believing that it would ever come to be an office in England, he being at that time pollefied with as full a defpair of his majefty's ever being reitored to his dominions, as Cromwell himfelf was with a confidence that it could never come to pafs, and fo modelling all his defigns to live in a good condition abroad, in which he had hitherto profpered fo wonderfully, and all places being alike and equal to him.

Hitherto he avouched nothing more than his being a protestant above temptation, frequented the exercife of devotion in the king's houfe, and gave all the evidence of his affection that way as could be expected from a man who was long known to have great latitude in religion ; and he had lately committed a younger fon to the care and education of the jefuits in France, upon fome promife the queen regent had made to him when he was in credit with her, that she would provide a liberal fapport for him in penfions, and church-livings, the receiving whereof he thought no religion could oblige a man to be averie from. Soon after his first coming into Flanders, and as foon as he found he had got credit there (which he still believed to be greater than in truth it was) he fent into England for a daughter he had there, of a full growth, who lived not easily with her mother, in order by his authority to compose some domettic differences, and to finish a treaty of marilage for her with a gentleman of the fame country, who had long made that address. As foon as the arrived in Flanders, he provided a private lodging for her in Ghent, which being in the riddle between Bruges, where the king  $D_2$ rendea.

refided, and Bruffels, where the Spanish court was, he thought to be a place where he could probably spend most part of his time; befides, having a great reverence for the lady abbefs of the English monattery there, he had a particular devotion for that city ; not without a defign to have his own devotion the better thought of, his daughter remained very few days in the lodging he had provided for her, before he removed her to the English cloyfter for her more honourable accommodation, whilit her flay thould be neceffary in those parts. The young lady was as averfe from a monakery, and from the religion that is professed there, as is possible for a daughter who had been bred from her cradle under the fevere difcipline of a mother of another faith, and in an age and region where the Romish religion was perfectly detokel, and the herfelf had always Loon tought very tharp objections againsh it; but her father eafily a reached her that there flould be 20 attal pt made upon her religion, but that the lodging fhould be very ra'le, and the conversation issh to the coald not but take delight in, and that the thould always be with him when he was in town, only lodge in the monastery, and rat there when he was away. And it cannot be denied but that the accommodation was very good, and prudently provided for her, the abbels being a lady of great repusation and wifdom, and the whole community confifted of ladies of noble extraction, great beauty, and unblemilhed virtue; and it was a great refpect in the abbels towards for father, and her dependence upon this great power at court, that perfunded her to receive his daughter into the monaftery, where none of any quality had ever been admitted into the inclosure who did not profels the Roman religion. But fhe had been there very few days, when a half-witted man of a good family and a competent fortune, meeting this young lady at fome houfe whither fhe ufed to accompany her father, made love to her, and there being a great friendfhip between the abbets and the mother of the young gentleman, who was a widow of very great reputation and effeem in that place, the matter was quickly proposed to the father, who, according to his natural alacrity, prefently looked upon it as a new manifestation of providence, that he and his family fhould never fall to infupportable neceffity; and transported with the vanity of the reputation he fhould acquire, that being defpoiled of his eftate, and banifhed from his country, he fhould raife himfelf to fuch a reputation with a neighbour nation, as to marry a daughter into one of the best families of it, adorned, as he would believe, with an ample revenue, and without any other portion than a promife to pay a competent one when he fhould be Without long deliberating able. on the bufinefs, and without confidering the weak fpirit of the young man, which was in truth contemptible, or fo much as examining the value and yearly revenue of the effate, which was not the twelfth part of what he himfelf gave it out to be; he first perfuaded his daughter to renounce her own religion, and become a Roman catholic, which was a condition without which the marriage could not be attained to, and then frankly gave her up to perpetual mifery, which the entered into from the day of

of her marriage : which, confidering all circumstances, would have brought much grief of mind to another parent, but he was of that rare conflitution, that those worldly things never gave him trouble, nor did he more confider the lofs of a child, in an adventure which probably might bring fome convenience to him (for himfelf was still first, if not fole in all those confiderations) than if it were his neighbour's, being absolutely divested of all troublefome affections which might obstruct or disturb his fortune, and with this kind of providence he made provision for two of his children.

Hitherto he had preferved, as he believed, his own reputation, as to being a protestant, unblemished .---He had refifted the temptations of France without being shaken, and though the jefuits always courted him with wonderful application and obfervance, and he them again with the fame dexterity, frequently gratifying them with fome arguments against the protestants, and acknowledging fome defects to be in their church, which he could wifh fupplied; yet after he had lodged fix months at Albey, in a college of the jefuits, where he fludied very hard, and read all books recommended by them to him, when the fuperior came to him at his remove towards Italy, and paffed many compliments with him of the honour the fociety had received in entertaining fo noble a perfon and to rarely qualified, he told him, he hoped that the obfervations he had made of their profeffion and their courfe of life, and the reflections which had occurred unto him upon the arguments he had found in fuch and fuch books, had by this time confirmed him in fuch a reverence towards the catholic church, that, all his former prejudice being removed, he would now throw himielf into the arms of it. He parted not with him in debt for any good words, commended the catholic religion as containing most excellent inducements to a pious life, which could not but be attended with falvation ; he admired and extolled the inflitution of the fociety, and their firict and pious observation of the rules prescribed to them, which in his judgment made them preferable to all other religious orders, and that he would always preferve a particular devotion for them. But he faid, whether it were by the difference of their educations, or the inequality of their understandings and judgments, he found that many arguments which appeared to them as infallible demonftrations, feemed in truth to him to carry little weight with them, and fo briefly enlarged upon fome particular inflances with a great fharpness of reason, yet with great modefly, and confusion of his own weakness; he concluded, that there was fomewhat wanting in their religion which kept him yet from being reconciled to it, and so he took his leave of Albey. But he now found that he must calculate his defigns to another meridian, and that the temper which had done him no harm in France would do him no good in Flanders, that the repucation of being a Christian was a title fufficient for many preferments, but that not being a catholic, in Spain took away the advantage of being a Christian. He never had any lively hopes of the king's reftoration, at least that he could ever be reitored but by catholic arms, and he had juit now feen the most D; probable probable defign the king had ever had, upon the hope of the affection and power of his own fubjects, mifcarry in the attempt of Sir George Booth, which was thought to be founded upon fo good mediums, that the king had withdrawn privately from Bruffels incognito, and attended only with four or five fervants, whereof that perfon was one, to the maritime parts of France, in fome affurance that the rebel's army would find fo many diversions in other parts of the kingdom, that he fhould find a competent body of men to receive him in Kent, with which he might march as he fhould find it most counsellable. But all thefe high imaginations coming to nothing, by the fudden defeat of Sir George Booth before Cheffer, and the surprifil of many other parties in feveral parts of the kingdom before they were well formed, and in a word, the imprifoning of all perfons of honour and reputation throughout the whole kingdom, who were in the leaft degree fufpected to with well to the king, teenied at the fame time to diferedit and reproach the late too eafy imaginations, and to pull up by the roots all the king's future hopes of reilitution, and in this melancholy difcomposure of mind the king returned again to Bruffels, and the other perion to his retreat at Ghent, to the admired abbefs and to his beloved daughter.

It was the great benefit and happinefs of his confitrution, that he never continued long irrefolute, or remained in fufpence; if that door was not open which he would chufe to enter at, the next was welcome to him. His hopes under the king were now blafted, and though he promifed himfelf much encouragement from the favour of Don Juan, yet, as was faid before, religion was that which could only make a man thine in the court of Spain, and he had made as much of his as it would yield him throughout his whole courfe of life, and it was like now to do him no farther fervice. As foon as he came to Ghent he pretended to be very fick, fent for physicians, described his difease to them, and propofed fome reafonable remedies to them; his friend the abbefs, who was really a much better cafuift than her confessor, did not fail to administer her spiritnal remembrances; and Courtney, the provincial of the English jesuits (a man who could never have been too hard for him, if he had not been reduced to great weaknefs) was at hand to do all his offices, and he did it very effectually, though in great fecret. He fent then to the marquis of Ormond and his other friend at Bruffels, upon whofe friendfhip he had ever depended, and had found him always fast and unshaken to him, notwithstanding his many imbecilities; he conjured them both (who were indeed the two only friends he had in the world) to repair to him at Ghent, for that his condition of health being at that time fo very doubtful, he had fomewhat to impart to them of the laft importance. The enemy had faftened themfelves in fome places between Bruffels and Ghent, and the feafon of the year was not fo pleafant as to invite men to unneceffary journies; it was therefore agreed between them, that the prefence of one of them would ferve the turn, let the bufinefs be what it would, and fo the marquis made a journey to him, the other remaining still with the king. When he came to Ghent he

he found him well recovered of his ficknefs, of which he made him a large relation ; by what degrees it came upon him, and how foon it had deprived him of his ftrength, how his fleeps forfook him, and that the night yielded him no reft; that in his agony he had made many reflections upon his past condition of life, and principally upon fome feruples in religion, which had been long in his mind; that he had fent for a learned jefuit to confer with him, and in a word, that he had received fo great fatisfaction from him, that he was become catholic, and was reconciled to the church; which he had no fooner fubmitted to, but that he found fo great a tranquillity and ferenity of mind, that he had wonderfully recovered in fo few days his perfect health, and almost his former ftrength. That having thus provided for the falvation of his foul, all his other thoughts were for the advancement of his majefty's fervice, or that at least, that this alteration in him might have no reflection upon the other, and that in this confideration he defired a conference with his two beft friends : and fince one of them came not, he would defire the fame from the other, which he meant to do from both, that he might receive his advice how the fame might be communicated to the king; and how, and when, and in what manner it fhould be made known; and that it was hitherto fo great a fecret, that it was only known to his confessor and himfelf; and that it fhould remain to as long as his majefty flould think it requisite; that he had in truth himfelf endeavoured, as a thing practicable in his own opinion, that it might have remained fo entire a secret between his confessor and himfelf, that he might not only have deferred making his convertiou public, but have performed all his ufual offices and fervices about his majefty as he had ufed to do, even at his devotions, fo that no man fhould have been able to make the leaft difcovery. But that his confeffor, upon great deliberation, and conference with many other very learned men, had declared to him, that what he propoled was to ablolutely unlawful, and inconfiftent with the catholic religion, that it was not in the power of his holine's himfelf to difpenfe with it. This being his cafe, he had no more to do but to defire that the whole relation might be candidly made to his majefy, and a gracious interpretation obtained from him upon it. The marquis (who was lefs furprized than his other friend, as having lefs opinion of his conftancy in that particular than the other had) answered him only, that he was forry for the change, and that he fhould give his majefty a full relation of it, and fo returned to Bruffels.

Within few days he came thither; and having been very careful to be first feen by Don Juan at mais, he attended the king, who received him without any cloudinefs, looking upon him of the fame religion as he had before underflood him to be. His majefty making himfelf very merry with his other friend for being to weak a man as to imagine that he could be conitant to any profession, and made himielf no lefs merry with the perion himfelf upon his teruples of confeience, and the method and circumstances of his convertion, and upon Father Courtney's having gained to great an aicendant over his understanding; and he was very glad to compound for being laughed at, and could bear a better part in it, than in the fericus debate of it. He was excledingly troubled to find his other friend, whole true affection to him had been upon all occasions fo manifeit, to fevere that he could not diffemble it in his countenance with him; and when the other renewed all professions of kindness and friendship to him, against all perfons and all pretences in the world, and defired that this alteration in him, which was the effect of confcience, and for his own falvation, might not deprive him of his friendfhip, or alienate his affections from him, he answered him very roundly, that he could not diffemble the trouble he fuffained, nor could bear that reproach which would fall upon himfelf if he were thought not to be displeased with it; that he knew not how he could hereafter bear any part in the king's councils, or how he could be communicated with; that though the professions he made to him of the conftancy of his friendfnip might be at that time according to his intention, yet that he had no reason to believe that they, who had power to prevail over him in this affair of the higheft importance, would ever be contented that he thould retain a friendship with a perfon fo oppofite to all their practices, and all their principles; against which they would always be able to fpeak more pertinently, both in reafon and religion, than they had done in any other part of his converfion; which he took very heavily, and could not forbear undervaluing and envying, against the whole body of them, with more reproach and contempt, than could have been expected from fo young a profelyte. The king had well forefeen that he could no longer wear the character either of his fecretary or counfellor, and it may be, that confideration had made him condefcend to be fo merry upon the convertion; and he was very well content that his friend thould plainly declare to him in his prefence the neceffity of his declining being prefent at future councils, and of returning the fignet to the king; with which, how much foever he was furprifed or difpleafed, he prefently fubmitted, and delivered the fignet the next day.

This was a change he did not expect his conversion would have produced, but had promifed himfelf more advantage from his character in his new religion than in his old; that there was no more hope now of the proteflant intereft, and therefore that the catholic muft be now wholly applied to, and that those transactions could pais through no other hand but his; and that as the confidence of the catholics fhould be able to advance the king's fervice, fo his fo near relation to his royal perfon and councils would give him great credit with the catholics. Such a crop of imaginations and prefumptions was always his first harvest upon any notable new defign or enterprize, but this new exclusion demolished all these hopes, and was a greater discovery of the king's diflike of what he had done, than in his calculation of ftate he thought feafonable for his majefty's fervice, and upon that ground was the lefs expected by him; and this he never forgave his old friend, though he continued to make the fame professions, and seemed to take it very unkindly that it should be thought that religion should be able to make any impression on him with reference to the friendships which which he had contracted. After the first congratulation for the becoming a Chriftian, which those people do very liberally make for a few days, he found no funfhine from the change of his climate ; that no proffer of place or penfion came from Spain; and that the pope, to whom he had made an early communication of his forrow for, and renunciation of his former herefy, had returned him no other exalted expressions, which he expected, than Tu conversus, converte fratres tuos; that Don Juan's own countenance was fo far from fhedding more graces towards him than it had formerly done, that it was in truth more referved; for the Marquis of Carracina, and efpecially Don Alonzo, who were not pleafed with the frequent admission he had to Don Juan, and his ferene countenance towards him, had fent their advertifements into Spain little to his advantage, and the prince had received fome reprehension from thence for his conferring those graces. But there happened fortly after another inftance, which manifeited enough what opinion that court had of him. The treaty between the two crowns being appointed to be at Fontarabia between the cardinal and Don Louis de Haro, Don Louis, who always profeffed great affection to the king, fent him a private advice by his refident in that court, Sir Henry Bennett, to find himfelf there, profeffing that he would do all he could to engage the cardinal, that the two crowns, being oace reconciled, might both engage in his majefty's interest, and at the same time advifed that his majefty would come with as fmall a train as he could fitly do, and particularly that by no means he would bring that perfon with him; which was a fufficient evidence of prejudice Notwithftanding which, the cardinal having expreisly refuted to grant a fafe conduct to his majefty to pafs through France, and as expreisly diffuaded his going to the treaty, as a thing which would prove to his difadvantage, and difenable his eminence, by the noife of it, to do those good offices for his majefty which he was refolved to do in his abfence, the king thought fit to follow the advice of the other favourite, and to make a journey thither through France incognito. And to that purpose he made choice of four or five fervants to attend him; and though he liked very well that gentleman's company in those jolly journies, yet at this time, the intimation he had from Spain, and the knowledge he had of the cardinal's particular and irreconcileable difpleafure towards him, made him plainly difcern that it was by no means fit to have him with him. However, the other in the end prevailed fo far with him, for the experience he had of the ways and places through which they were to pass, that he was admitted to attend, together with the Marquis of Ormond, Daniel O'Neale, and three other fervants; and in that manner they went from Bruffels with all the fecrefy imaginable; nor was it known in many days after whither the king was gone. The king was contented to fee as many confiderable places as were within any diffance of the ways through which they were to pais, and the other, who was the iole conductor, led him fo far about, that the treaty was upon the matter concluded before the king came to the borders; and then, upon the general general intelligence that the treaty was at an end, and Don Louis returned to Madrid, though the king had fent the Marquis of Ormond directly to Fontarabia to know the truth, and to inform Don Louis of his majesty's arrival, yet without staying for his return, the other perfuaded the king, that he ought to make all poffible hafte to Madrid; and fo far prevailed, that they went as far as Saragofa in the kingdom of Arragon, where they received clear information that Don Louis remained still at the place of the treaty. And within a day after, an express arrived from thence, with all the importunity from the Marquis of Ormond and Sir Henry Bennett, that his majesty would make all poffible hafte thither ; fignifying further the prejudice he had fuffered by the delays he had made in his journey, and the unexpressible displeasure Don Louis had conceived upon his purpole of going to Madrid, which in that conjuncture would have occasioned great diforder in the King of Spain's affairs, all which made deep impreffions in his majefty, and made him difcern how inconvenient the fanciful humour of his guide had been to him. The king's reception at Fontarabia, and his treatment there, was agreeable to the Spaniard's cuftom in those occasions, full of respect and application to his majefty; and in the fhort ftay he made there, the other perfon (who was upon all the difadvantages mentioned before) had, by his pure dexterity and addrefs, wrought himfelf fo far into the good opinion of Don Louis, and the other grandees who accompanied him, that when the king returned through France for Bruffels, he found encouragement to go directly for Madrid, where he was well received by the king, and fupplied with at leaft two or three thousand pound fterling, and ftaid there until he heard of the great change of affairs in England, and of his majefly's reception there, where he found him in the full posseficion and administration of his regal power.

By this time the king was engaged very far in his treaty with Purtugal for the marriage with the queen, all particulars being in the truth upon the matter agreed upon; which no fooner came to this gentleman's knowledge but he expressed a marvellous diflike of it, and (without any capacity which might entitle him to that prefumption) fuggefted all things to the king which the Spanish ambassador could fuggett to him, and which were most like to make fome impression upon his majefty; fuch as the deformity of her perion, the number of her years, and her incapacity of bearing children; and at the fame time made offer of the choice of two young ladies of the house of Medici, of fuch rare perfection in beauty as his fancy could defcribe, and (which is very wonderful) prevailed to far privately with the king, to fend him incognito into Italy to fee those ladies, with a promise not to proceed further in the treaty with Portugal till his return; but upon a short reflection upon the difhonour of this defign, his Majesty put a quick end to it, renewing his old observations of the humour and prefumptions of the man. How many extravagant propositions and defigns he afterwards run into, till he fo far provoked the king that he gave orders for his apprelienfion and commitment to the Tower, is known 10 to all men; and how many more he is like hereafter to fall into of the fame kind, can hardly be forefeen, even by those who beit underfland his unlimited ambition, and the reftleffness of his humour.

I did not intend to have reflected upon fo many particulars, much lefs to have taken any furvey of the active life of this very confiderable perfon; but it was hardly poffible to give any lively description of his nature and humour, or any character even of his perfon and composition, without representing some inftances of particular actions ; which, being fo contradictory to themfelves, and fo different from the fame effects which the fame caufes naturally produce in other men, can only qualify a man to make a conjecture what his true conflitution and nature was; and at best it will be but a conjecture, fince it is not poffible to make a positive conclusion or deduction from the whole or any part of it, but that another conclusion may be as reafonably made from fome other action and difcovery. It is pity that his whole life fhould not be exactly and carefully written, and it would be as much pity that any body elfe fhould do it but himfelf, who could only do it to the life, and make the trueft deferiptions of all his faculties, and paffions, and appetites, and the full operation of them; and he would do it with as much ingenuity and integrity as any man could do, and expole himfelf as much to the cenfure and reproach of other men, as the malice of his greatest eneny could do; for in truth he does believe many of those particular actions, which fevere and rigid men do look upon as disfigurings of the other beautiful part of his life, to be great luftre and ornament to it : and would rather expose it nakedly to have the indiferetion and unwarrantable part of it cenfured, than that the fancy and high projection should be concealed, it being an infirmity that he would not part with, to believe that a very ill thing fubtilly and warily defigned, and well and bravely executed, is much worthier of a great spirit, than a faint acquiescence under any infelicity, merely to contain himfelf within the bounds of innocence ; and yet if any man concludes from hence that he is of a fierce and impetucus disposition, and prepared to undertake the worft enterprize, he will find caufe enough to believe himfelf mittaken, and that he hath foftnefs and tendernefsenough about him to reftrain him, not only from ill, but even from unkind and illnatured actions. No man loves more passionately and violently, at least makes more lively expressions of it : and that his hatred and malice, which fometimes break out from him with great impetuoity, as if he would deflroy all he diflikes, is not compounded proportionably out of the fame fiery materials, appears in this, that he would not only, upon very fhort warning and very eafy address, truth a man who had done him injury to a very notable degree, but even fuch a man, as he himfelf had provoked beyond the common bounds of reconciliation: he doth not believe that any body he loves fo well, can be unloved by any body elfe; and, that whatever prejudice is contracted against him, he could remove it. if he were but admitted to conference with them which own it. No man can judge, hardly guefs, by what he hath done formerly, what he

he will do in the time to come; whether his virtues will have the better, and triumph over his vanities, or whether the fliength and vigour of his ambition, and other exorbitances, will be able to fupprefs, and even extinguish his better disposed inclinations and refolutions, the fucceis of which will always depend upon circumstances and contingencies, and from fomewhat without, and not within himfelf. I fhould not imagine that ever his activity will be attended with fuccefs or fecurity; but without doubt, if ever his reflections upon the vanity of the world dispose him to contemn it, and to betake himfelf to a contemplation of God, and nature, or to a firici and fevere devotion, to which he hath fometimes fome temptation, if not inclination; or if a fatiety in wrefiling and ftruggling in the world, or a defpair of profpering by those strugglings, shall prevail with him to abandon those contefts, and retire at a good dif- . tance from the court to his books and a contemplative life, he may live to a great and a long age; and will be able to leave fuch information and advertisements of all kinds to posterity, that he will be looked upon as a great mirror by which well-difposed men may learn to drefs themselves in the best ornaments, and to spend their lives to the best advantage of their country.

NATURAL

NATURAL HISTORY.

The Natural Hiftory of the different Serpents in the East-Indies, from the Essays of Mons. F. d'Obsonville, on the nature of various foreign Animals, translated by T. Holcroft.

THESE animals, which, as they wind and the felves, advance filently by a progreffive undulation ; and when they fleep or reft, form their bodies into a number of circles, of which the head is the centre: which, after they have caft their fkins, appear all at once with a renovated brilliancy; these animals, so dangerous if they are irritated, were the fymbols of wildom, prudence, and immortality, among the ancient philofophers. They are divided into a multitude of fpecies, that differ by the intenfity of their poilon, the fize of their bodies, the colours with which their fkins are fpotted; and, though most common in marshy grounds, are found alfo in the fea, on rocky mountains, and in barren places. They are all carnivorous, and there are fome fpecies that devour the others. I shall speak particularly of fome of those only that are least known in Europe, and which I have had opportunities of obferving with confiderable attention.

Serpent Marin, or Sea Serpent * .--The approach of the coafts of India is almost always known by these Serpents, which are met at from twenty to thirty leagues diffance. Their bite may be mortal, if not timely counteracted by fome of the specifics hereaster mentioned. These reptiles appeared to me to be from three to four feet long; I do not know if there are any larger. 1 do not believe they are precifely amphibious, that is to fay, that they have the power allo of living on land. I have often feen them on the fhore, but they have always been thrown there by the furges, and were either dead or dying.

Serpent couronné. The crowned or booded Serpent. This fpecies extends from five to fix feet in length; the fkin is divided in fmall regular compartments, which being contraited and feparated, more or leis, with green, yellow, and brown, have a tolerably beautiful effect. It is called hooded from the Portuguefe word capelo, becaufe it has a loofe fkin under its head, which can be extended to both fides; and, when it is fo, forms a fort of hood, on which is drawn the refemblance almost of a pair of spectacles. This loofe fkin never takes that form but when the animal rears itfelf, agitated by fear, rage, or aftonishment; in a word, by fome object that affects it forcibly. In which cafe it raifes the fore part of its body to nearly a third of its length; its head is then almost in continual action, it feems to look all around, but remains in the fame place, or creeps flowly on its hind parts. Whence this fpecies is in India, more than any other, the emblem of prudence; but when it eats, fleeps, or is purfued, its hood is not extended, becaufe the muscles are then either relaxed or differently employed. This Serpent is an object of fuperflitious veneration among the Gentoo Indians, founded on fome traits of legendary mythology: they feldom name it without adding fome epithet, fuch as the royal, the good, the holy. Some of them are happy to fee it go and come in their houfes ; whence many have received irreparable injuries : for it is very poffible to hurt it unintentionally, without feeing it, or during fleep, and it immediately revenges ittelf with fury. Its bite is fometimes mortal in two or three hours, efpecially if the poifon has penetrated the larger veffels or mufcles.

* The Serpent is called Mar, in Persian; Hai, and Laiffa, in Arabic; Neah, or Pampou, in Tamoul; and Samp, Kakoutia, Boura, and Tchild, in Indoftan. The Sea Serpent, Cadel Pampou, in Tamoul. The Hooded Serpent, Nalle Pampou, in Tamoul; Cokra, in Indoftan. The Javeline, Green, or Flying Serpent, Pache Pampou, in Tamoul; and Marferend, in Persian. The Viper, Marafi, in Persian.

This reptile, more than any other, is attentive to the found of a fort of flagcolet or pipe. The Indian jugglers play a certain monotonous air, flow and unharmonious, which at first feems to create astonishment, prefently it advances, stops, rears itself, and extends its hood; fometimes it will remain an hour in that position, and then, by gentle inclinations of the head, indicate that these founds impress a fense of pleasure on its organs. Of this I have feveral times been convinced, by proofs made on this kind of Serpents, which have never been trained to that exercife, and particularly upon one that I caught in my garden. I do not however deny, that fome are trained to this exercife : the jugglers, when called to clear a houfe of them, will fometimes artfully drop one of thefe, which will immediately appear at the found of the pipe, to which it has been accuftomed.

Serpent jawelot, or green Serpent. The green Serpent is found, in the Indies and the countries east of the Peninfula, four and five feet long; its bite is held to be at least as dangerous as that of the hooded fnake: they generally remain on the tops of trees, watching for birds and infects. Sufpended or laid along the branches, which they embrace with the tip of the tail, they appear immoveable, when, prefently, with an ofcillatory motion, they will reach to another bough, or feize upon their prey. Hence it is probable, that from a fuperficial view of the manner in which thefe reptiles obtain their fubfistence, fome travellers have faid, that they have a particular delight to dart upon the eyes of paffengers. For my own part, I am well perfuaded, that when they dart, or rather when they glide along at the approach of man, it is only to avoid him, except, perhaps, when they have been wounded or irritated; fo at least has it happened, for more than ten times that I have feen them. I prefume, that this reptile is of the fame species with with one of a darker colour, found alfo on the coafts of Perfin and Arabia, where it is known by the improper name of the Flying Serpent.

Serpent amphisbrena, or doublebeaded Serpent. Some of the reptiles, classed under this name, are found in the Indies; their colour is a deep dirty brown, mixed with a tint of yellow, their fpots fomething darker; their head is narrow, and rounded on the fides ; and their body, which is feldom more than a foot long, is nearly, from one end to the other, about the thickness of the thumb. One confequence of this formation is, that at a diftance the tail may appear to have been cut off, or may look like another head: I fay at a distance, for in fact it has, at this extremity, a pointed bit of flefh that refembles the beginning of a lizard's tail, and which being plucked off, begins to grow again. Befides, as they feldom remove far from the crevices of rocks, or old ruins, it is very poffible, that they may have been feen at the entry of their holes retiring backwards. However this may be, and without pretending to deny the poffibility of fuch fports of nature, it is certain, and I am myfelf a witnefs of it, that the fpecies to which they have given the name of double-headed Serpents, has, in reality, but one head. I never knew any perfon who had been bit by them, but I have been affured their poifon is not more dangerous than that of the hooded Serpent.

Serpent poison, or poison Serpent. Among the Serpents of India, that which I believe to be most formidable is but about two feet long, and very fmall. Its skin is freckled with little traits of brown, or a pale red, and contrasted with a ground of dirty vellow : it is molly found in dry and rocky places, and its bite mortal in lefs than one or two minutes. In the year 1759, and in the province of Cadapet, I faw feveral inflances of it; and among others, one very fingular, in the midit of a corps of troops, commanded by M. de Buffy. An Indian Gentoo merchant perceived a Mahometan foldier of his acquaintance going to kill one of these reptiles, which he had found fleeping under his packet. The Gentoo flew to beg its life, protesting, that it would do no hurt if it was not first provoked; paffing, at the fame time, his hand under its belly to carry it out of the camp, when fuddenly it twifted round, and bit his little finger; upon which this unfortunate martyr of a fanatic charity gave a shriek, took a few steps, and fell down infenfible. They flew to his affiftance, applied the ferpent-stone, fire, and scarifications, but they were all ineffectual, his blood was already coagulated. About an hour after I faw the body as they were going to burn it, and I thought I perceived fome indications of a complete diffolution of the blood.

I do not believe there are many Gentoos enthuliastic enough to become the victims of fuch abfurd benevolence; several, at prefent, make no great difficulty of killing these Serpents, or at least of seeing them killed. It is however certain, that most of them are unwilling to affift in killing the hooded Serpent, and especially those which creep isto, and are therefore under the protection of their temples.

Scrpent brulan, or burning Serpent. This reptile is nearly of the fame form form with the last-mentioned: its fkin is not quite fo deep a brown, and is speckled with dark green fpots; its poilon is almost as dangerous, but it is lefs active, and its effects are very different : in some perfons it is a devouring fire, which, as it circulates through the veins, prefently occasions death ; the blood diffolves into a lymphatic liquor, refembling thin broth, without apparently having paffed through the intermediate flate of coagulation, and runs from eyes, nofe, and ears, and even through the pores. ln. other subjects, the poilon feems to have changed the very nature of the humours in diffolving them; the fkin is chapped, and becomes fcaly, the hair falls off, the members are tumified, the patient feels all over his body the most racking pains, then numbnefs, and is not long in perifhing. It is faid, however, that people have been cured by remedies well and foon applied. Be that as it may, it feems to me, that the poifon of these different reptiles is in general more powerful, the more they live in hot and dry places, where they feed upon infects that are full of faline, volatile, and acrimonious particles.

Serpent nain, or dwarf Serpent. One day, as I was removing fome ftones in the Indies, I found two of thefe little animals, which at firlt fight might be taken for worms. I took up the ftrongeft, and amufed myfelf fome time in confidering it with attention. Its body was near five inches long, and about the fixth part of an inch in diameter; and I afterwards learnt, that it rarely exceeds fix inches in length. Its fkin was a dirty brown, fpotted on the fides with fmall lengthened points of a darker colour; the belly was thinly speckled, and of a something lighter colour, like the generality of reptiles. Its eyes, notwithstanding their exceffive smallness, were apparently black and fparkling; its mouth was exceedingly wide, infomuch that without the leaft violence I could introduce a body of more than a line in diameter; its teeth were as fine as the points of needles, but fo fnort and compact, that it did not appear poffible for it to bite a man, or at least for it to penetrate beyond the epidermis. The chief of the village where I was, told me, that the only thing to be apprehended from this infect was, left it should introduce itself into the mouth or noftrils.

Serpent titan, or giant Serpent.-The mountains least frequented in India and other parts of Afia, ferve for the retreat of a race of Serpents that I call Titan, because they grow to the length of twenty and twentyfive feet, and even, according to fome, to half as much more. I never faw but one young one, fhut up in a cage, and exceedingly ill at his eafe. It was eleven or twelve feet long, and fourteen or fifteen inches in circumference; its skin was a tawny ground, but speckled with colours richly varied, though rather dark. They fay this reptile furprizes and feeds upon large animals; but whatever may be faid. upon this fubject, its form feems to indicate, that its ffrength cannot be compared to that of a crocodile of equal fize : and as it is heavy, and not common, it is, in reality, one of the least dangerous of its tribe. I may add, with respect to these animals, that in all the species I have observed, those which were of the two extremes of fize, large and fmall, were fewest in number.

Natural

Natural History of the Ichneumon *; from the fame Work.

THE ancients have observed, that the Ichneumon is one of the most formidable enemies of the crocodile at his birth; for after he has left the egg, he is in daily danger of being devoured by it for the firft months. Not that I suppose the ichneumon to have any particular and inflinctive antipathy to the crocodile : he equally attacks all fpecies of reptiles, and does not fpare even rats or poultry. I had one of them verv young, and brought it up : I fed it at first with milk, and afterwards with baked meat mixed with rice; and castrated it at four months old. It became tamer than a cat, for it came when called, and followed me, though at liberty, into the country.

One day I brought him a fmall water-ferpent alive, being defirous to know how far his inftinct would carry him against a being with which he was hitherto unacquainted. His first emotion seemed to be attonishment mixed with anger, for his hair became crect, but in an inflant after he flipped behind the reptile, and with a remarkable fwiftnefs and agility leaped upon its head, feized it, and crushed it between his teeth. This effay and new aliment feemed to have awakened in him his innate and destructive voracity, which, till then, had given way to the gentlenels of his education. I had about my houfe feveral curious kinds of fowls, among which he had been brought up, and which, till then, he had iuffered to go and come unmoleited and unregarded; but a few days after, when he found himfelf alone, he itrangled them every one, eat a little, and, as it feemed to me, had drank the blood of two.

The Ichneumon may attain the fize of a common cat, but is something longer in the body, and fhorter in the legs; its fur contains tints of white, of brown, of fawn-colour, and of a dirty grey filver. These shades, which are on each hair, compose a whole, which, though not fost to the touch, is agreeable to the eye. Its form, and particularly the head, is fomething like that of the polecat: its eyes are fmall, but inflamed, and fparkle with a fingular vivacity; its nails are not very pointed, nor do they extend and contract like those of the cat, but as its claws are rather long, it feizes between its paws, and retains with force, the prey that it devours.

As it is a great defiroyer of reptile:, it is very pofible that it may fometimes receive a bite, in which cale it is pretended, that it has recourfe to the plant which is called after its name; but as it fubfits, and always with the fame inclinations, in many places where this plant is not at hand, and is not even to be found, perhaps it is the defin of the reptiles which ferves for an antidote, or perhaps it is the quality of its blood not to be affected by this kind of perion."

* The Ichneumon, herter known by the name of Mangoult among the Indian Europeans, is called Tkill, in Malabar; and Monegouche, in Lamoul.

NALASA

Natural Hiftory of the Thevangua, or Tatonneur *; from the fame.

<sup>44</sup> THE Thevangualives retired among the rocks and woods of the moth folitary and fouthern parts of India, and in the ifland of Ceylon. Notwithflanding fome fimilarity of organization, he neither appertains to the monkey nor makis fpecies. This race is pure, feparate, and diffinct, as well in conformation as in faculties and manners; and as he is little known, I fhall give fome defeription of his form, and particularly of his characteriftic habits.

The Thevangua is quadrumane, and would be well defcribed by the name of the pigmy cynocephalus In 1755, one of nightwalker. those Indian pioneers, who always wander with their families, fold me one. He was not quite a foot high when erect, though I have heard they are fometimes a little taller : mine was guite formed, and, during a year that I kept him, I could not find that he had increased in height. His ears and the back part of his head refembled those of the monkey, but his front was proportionably large and more flattened; his nofe, as flender and more fhort than that of the pole-cat, projected juft below the eyes, fomething like the muzzle of a fmall Spanifli dog; his mouth, exceedingly wide and well garnished, was armed with four long and pointed canine teeth; his eyes large, and even with the face, the iris apparently of a brown-grey, mixed with a tint of yellow; his neck fhort, his body very long, and his fize, above his hips, at least three inches in circumference. I had him caftrated, and his tefticles, though proportionably very large, were abfolutely fhut up in the belly; his penis was well detached from his body, and covered with a prepuce.

Many other parts, likewife, of thefe fingular animals, appear to be formed in miniature on the model of man. Thus they have no tail, their buttocks are flefhy, and without callofities; their breaft large, their hands and arms well turned, and fo are their legs, except that their great toes are too much feparated, like those of the monkey +; the hair of their head and back is of a dirty

* The animal I defcribe by the name of Tatonneur (creeper) on account of his mode of walking, is well characterized in India by the Tamoul word Thevangua. He is called Tongre likewife; that is to fay, the fleeper. This is the animal which M. de Buffon has called Loris (after the article Makis) which name was given it by the Dutch, who faw it in the ifland of Ceylon. I prefume, that at a diffance they imagined they diffcovered a refemblance between the cry of this animal and that of a parrot, really called Loris, which is found in the ifles to the eatt of India. Such refemblances naturally occasion mifunderstandings.

+ The figure of the Thevangua, or Loris, in M. de Buffon, is very correct, except that the bones, and efpecially the articulations of the hands and feet, do not appear fo prominent in the living animal. But fuch little irregularities are to be found in the features of every fubject, as foon as the flefh and muscles become dry, and are deprived of that roundnefs which gives beauty and proportions.

M. de Buffon, in the fhort defcription he has given of this animal, mentions a remarkable circumstance, and perhaps unique, which is, " that the female urines a dirty grey, a little inclinable to the fawn; but on the fore-part of their body it is much lefs deep and thick, and leaves the flefh vifible, which is of a foft, fair, and animated colour.

The Thevangua ufually goes on all fours, but with a kind of confiraint, infomuch, that when he wifhes to make hafte, he fcarcely runs four fathoms in a minute, which tardinefs originates in his conformation and habits; his legs and thighs, as well as man's, are apparently too long to run after the manner of quadrupedes; and it has always feemed to me, that when the one I had was obliged, by carrying fomething in his arms, to walk upright, he went with greater freedom.

This animal has a modulation in his voice, a kind of whiftling tha is not unpleafant. I could eafily diffinguifh the cry of pain or pleafure, or even that of chagrin or impatience: if, for example, I pretended to rob him of his prey, his countenance changed, and he inwardly uttered a tremulous, more acute, and painful tone. The Indian, of whom I bought mine, told me, that their mode of copulation was face to face, clofe, and crouching on their hams.

The Thevangua differs greatly from the monkey in his exterior form, but more still in his character and manners. He is by nature melancholy, filent, patient, carnivorous, and noctambulous. Retired, and living only with his little family, he remains crouching all day, with his head refting upon his hands, and his elbows between his thighs. But in the midft of this fleep, or state of inertia, though his eyes are closed, his ears remain exceedingly fensible to all impreffions from without, and he never neglects to feize whatever prey fhall inconfiderately venture within his reach. Though I believe the glare of the fun difpleafes him, yet I never could find that the pupil of his eye fuffered any extraordinary contraction, or was fatigued by day-light. It is, without deubt, this happy conformation which preferves him, though feeble and flow, from other ferocious beafts, and gives him a fuperiority over the lefs and nimbler creatures, on which he ufually feeds. I kept mine, during the firft month, tied round the waift by a cord, which, without attempting to untic, he fometimes lifted up with an air of grief. I took charge of him myfelf, and he bit me at the urines through the clitoris, which has a paffage like the penis of the male, and these two parts have a perfect refemblance both in length and thickness."

Having never heard of this fingularity in India, I confels I made no enquiries on the fubject; and if the remark has been transfinitted to Europe by an exact obferver, I am wrong to doubt the fact. I will relate, however, what has fruck me on this matter, with refpect to wild fhe-apes : many of thefe have the clitoris fo long, that it often projects forward, and, at first fight, appears like the penis of the male; but it is not fo fituated, has no passage, and is less. If we suppose that the female Thevangua fometimes has this small mulcular body, equally projecting, it is not at all impossible, but that a traveller, not very attentive, and perhaps a little in love with the marvellous, may have imagined he has really ieen them urine through that part. However, I should be far from denying a fact, because it was a little more or less out of the common order of nature. I only mention my sufficients.

beginning four or five times, for offering to didarb or take him up; but gentle challdement having foon corrected theie little paffions, 1 afterwards gave him the liberty of my bed-chamber. Towards night he would ruo his eyes, then looking attentively round, would walk upon the furniture, or offener upon ropes that 1 had placed on purpofe.

A little milk, or very juicy fraits, were not difagreeable to him; but this was a laft refource, he was only fond of imall birds and all forts of infects. If he beheld game of this kind, which I used to tie at the part of the chamber opposite to him, or fhew him and invite him to me, he would prefently approach with a long careful step, like a perfon walking on tip-toe going to fur-prife another. When he was within a foot of his prey, he would ftop, and raiting himfelf upright, advance gently, fretching out his arm, then at once feizing, would ftrangle it with remarkable celelerity.

This little animal perified by accident. He appeared much attached to me; it was my culous to carefs him, effectively after feeding: his return of affection confilted in taking the end of my fingen, preffing them to his bofom, and fiving his eyes half open upon mine."

Particulars relative to the Notare and Cuftoms of the Indians of North-America. By Mr. Richard McCaufland, Surgeon to the King's or Eighth Regiment of Poot. Communicated by Joleph Planta, Eig. Sec. R. S. From Vol. LXXVI. of the Philosophical Transactions.

T has been advanced by feveral travellers and historians that the Indians of America differed from other males of the human fpecies in the want of one very characteriftic mark of the fex, to wit, that of a beard. From this general obfervation, the Efquimaux have been excepted; and hence it has been fuppofed, that they had an origin different from that of the other natives of America. Inferences have alfo heen drawn, not only with refpect to the origin, but even relative to the conformation of Indians, as if this was in its nature more imperfect than that of the reft of mankind.

It appears fomewhat fingular that authors, in deducing the origin both of the Efquimaux and of the other Indians of America from the old world, fhould never have explained to us how the former came to retain their beards, and the latter to lay them afide. To afcertain the au-thenticity of this point may perhaps prove of little real utility to mankind; but the fingularity of the fact certainly claims the attention of the curious: and as it is impoffible to fix any limits to the inferences which may at one time or another be drawn from alledged facts, it mult always be of confequence to enquire into the authenticity of those facts, how little interesting foever they may at prefent appear.

I will not by any means take upon me to fay that there are not initions of America deflitute of beards; but ten years refidence at Niagara, in the midft of the Six-Nations (wich frequent opportunities of feeing other nations of Indians) has convinced me, that they do not differ from the rolt of men, in this particular, more than one European differs from another; and as this imperfection has been attributed to the Indians of North America, equally equally with those of the rest of the Continent, I am much inclined to think, that this affertion is as voidof foundation in one region as it is in the other.

All the Indians of North America (except a very fmall number, who, from living among white people, have adopted their cultoms) pluck out the hairs of the beard; and as they begin this from its first appearance, it must naturally be supposed, that to a fuperficial obferver their faces will feem fmooth and beardlefs. As further proof that they have beards, we may observe, firit, that they all have an infirument for the purpose of plucking them out. Secondly, that when they neglect this for any time, feveral hairs fprout up, and are feen upon the chin and face. Thirdly, that many Indians allow tufts of hair to grow upon their chins or upper lips, refembling those we see in different nations of the old world. Fourthly, that feveral of the Mohocks, Delawares, and others, who live amongit white people, fometimes fnave with razors, and fometimes pluck their beards out. These are facts which are notorious amongst the army, Indian traders, &c.; and which are never doubted in that part of the world by any perfon in the least conversant with Indians : but as it is difficult to transport a matter of belief from one country to another distant one, and as the authors who have maintained the contrary opinion are too refpectable to be doubted upon light grounds, I by no means intend to reft the proofs upon what has been faid, or upon my fingle affertion.

I have provided myfelf with two authorities, which I apprehend may in this cafe be decinive. One is Colonel Batler, deputy superintendant of Indian affairs, well known in the face American war, whofe great and extensive influence amongit the Six-vations could not have been acquired by any thing lets than his long and intimate knowledge of them and their language. The other authority is that of Theyendunega, commonly known by the name of Captain Joseph Brant, a Mohock Indian of great influence, and much fooken of in the late war. He was in England in 1775, and writes and speaks the Englith language with tolerable accuracy. 1 shall therefore only fubjoin their opinions upon this matter, the originals of which I have under their own flgnatules.

Colonel BUTLER's.

The men of the Six-Nation Indians have all beards naturally, as have all the other nations of North America which I have had an opportunity of leeing. Several of the Mohocks thave with razors, as do likewife many of the Panees who are kept as flaves by the Europeans. But in general the Indians pluck out the beard by the roots from its earlieft appearance; and as their faces are therefore fmooth, it has been supposed that they were destitute of beards. 1 am even of opinion, that if the Indians were to practife thating from their youth, many of them would have as frong beards as Europeans.

(Signed)

JOHN BUTLER, Agent of India Atlaits. Niagara, April 12, 1784.

Captain BRANT's.

The men of the Six-Nations E 3 have have all beards by nature; as have likewife all other Indian nations of North America which I have feen. Some Indians allow a part of the beard upon the chin and upper lip to grow, and a few of the Mohocks fhave with razors in the fame manner as Europeans; but the generality pluck out the hairs of the beard by the roots as foon as they begin to appear; and as they continue this practice all their lives, they appear to have no beard, or at most only a few straggling hairs which they have neglected to pluck out. I am however of opinion, that if the Indians were to fhave they would never have beards altogether fo thick as the Europeans; and there are fome to be met with who have actually very little beard.

(Signed)

Jos. BRANT THAYENDAREGA. Niagara, April 19, 1783.

Upon this fubject I shall only further observe, that it has been supposed by some, that this appearance of beard on Indians arises only from a mixture of European blood; and that an Indian of pure race is entirely defitute of it. But the nations amongs whom this circumstance can have any influence, bear so small a proportion to the multitude who are unaffected by it, that it cannot by any means be confidered as the cause; nor is it looked upon as fuch, either by Captain Brant or Colonel Butler.

I fhall here fubjoin a few particulars relative to the Indians of the Six-Nations, which, as they feem not to be well underftood even in America, are probably fiill lefs known in Europe. My authori ties upon this fubject, as well as upon the former, are the Indian Captain Brant and Colonel Butler.

Each nation is divided into three or more tribes; the principal of which are called the turtle-tribe, the wolf-tribe, and the bear-tribe.

Each tribe has two, three, or more chiefs, called Sachems; and this diftinction is always hereditary in the family, but defcends along the female line : for instance, if a chief dies, one of his fifter's fons, or one of his own brothers, will be appointed to fucceed him. Among thefe no preference is given to proximity or primogeniture; but the Sachem, during his life-time, pitches upon one whom he fuppofes to have more abilities than the reft: and in this choice he frequently, though not always, confults the principal men of the tribe. If the fuccessor happens to be a child, the offices of the post are performed by fome of his friends until he is of fufficient age to act himfelf.

Each of these posts of Sachem has a name which is peculiar to it, and which never changes, as it is always adopted by the fuccessfor; nor does the order of precedency of each of these names or titles ever vary. Nevertheles, any Sachem, by abilities and activity, may acquire greater power and influence in the nation than those who rank before him in point of precedency; but this is merely temporary, and dies with him.

Each tribe has one or two chief warriors, which dignity is alfo hereditary, and has a peculiar name attached to it.

Thefe are the only titles of diftinction which are fixed and permanent in the nation; for although any Indian may by fuperior talents, either as a counfellor or as a warrior, rior, acquire influence in the nation, vet it is not in his power to tranfmit this to his family.

The Indians have also their great women as well as their great men, to whose opinions they pay great deference; and this diffinction is also hereditary in families. They do not fit in council with the Sachems, but have feparate ones of their own.

When war is declared, the Sathems and great women generally give up the management of public affairs into the hands of the warriors. It may however fo happen, that a Sachem may at the fame time be also a chief warrior.

Friendships feem to have been instituted with a view towards ftrengthening the union between the feveral nations of the confederacy; and hence friends are called the finews of the Six-Nations. An Indian has therefore generally one or more friends in each nation. Befides the attachment which fubfifts during the life-time of the two friends, whenever one of them happens to be killed, it is incumbent on the furvivor to replace him, by prefenting to his family either a fcalp, a prifoner, or a belt confifting of fome thousands of wainpum; and this ceremony is performed by every friend of the deceased.

The purpose and foundation of war parties therefore, is in general, to procure a prifoner or fcalp to replace the friend or relation of the Indian who is the head of the party. An Indian who wifhes to replace a friend or relation prefents a belt to his acquaintance, and as many as chufe to follow him accept this belt, and become his party. After this, it is of no confequence whether he goes on the expedition or remains at home (as it often happens that he is a child) he is ftill confidered as the head of the party. The belt he prefented to his party is returned fixed to the scalp or prisoner, and paffes along with them to the friends of the perfon he replaces. Hence it happens, that a war party, returning with more fcalps or prifoners than the original intention of the party required, will often give one of these supernumerary scalps or prifoners to another war party whom they meet going out; upon which this party, having fulfilled the purpole of their expedition, will fometimes return without going to war.

Some particulars of the present state of Mount Veiuvius. Extracted from a letter from Sir William Hamilton, K. B. F. R. S. and A. S. to Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. P. R.S. From the fame.

Naples, January 24, 1786.

" Sir,

THE eruption of Mount Ve-fuvius, which he fuvius, which began in the month of November, 1784, nearly at the moment of my return from England to this capital, and which continued in fome degree till about the 20th of last month, has afforded much amusement to travellers unacquainted with this wonderful operation of nature, but no new circumftance that could juffify my troubling you with a letter on the fubject. The lava either overflowed the rim of the crater, or isfued from fmall fisfures on its borders, on that fide which faces the mountain of Somma, and ran more or lefs in one, and at times in three or four chan-E 4 rel.

nels, regularly formed, down the flanks of the conical part of the volcano ; fometimes defcending and fpreading itfelf in the valley between the two mountains; and once, when the eruption was in its greateft force, in the month of November lait, the lava descended still lower, and did fome damage to the vineyards, and cultivated parts at the foot of Veluvius, towards the village of St. Sebaftiano ; but generally the lava, not being abundant, flopped and cooled before it was able to reach the valley. By the accumulation of these lava's on the flanks of Vefuyius, its form has been greatly altered; and by the frequent explosion of fcoriæ and afhes, a confiderable mountain has been formed within the crater, which now rifing much above its rim has likewife given that part of the mountain a new appearance. Just before I left Naples, in May 1783, I was at the top of Vesuvius. The crater was certainly then more than 250 feet deep, and was impracticable, its fides being nearly perpendicular. This eruption, however, has been as fatisfactory as could be defired by the inhabitants of this city, a prodigious quantity of lava having been difgorged; which matter, confined within the bowels of the earth, would probably have occafioned tremors; and even flight ones might prove fatal to Naples, whofe houfes are, in general, very high, ill built, and a great number in almost every fireet already fupported by props, having either fuffered by former earthquakes, or from the loofe volcanicfoil's having been washed from under their foundations by the torrents of rain-water from the high grounds which furround Naples, and on which a great part of the town itfelf is built.

From the time of the last formidable eruption of Mount Veluvius, in August 1779 (described in one of my former communications to the Royal Society) to this day, I have, with the affiftance of the Father. Antonio Piaggi *, kept an exactdiary of the operations of Vefuvius, with drawings, fhewing, by the quantity of fmoke, the degrees of fermentation of the volcano; alio the courfe of the lava's during this laft eruption, and the changes that have been made in the form of the mountain itself by the lava's and fcoriæ that have been ejected. Thisjournal is becoming-very curious and interesting; it is remarkably fo with respect to the pointing out a variety of fingular effects that different currents of air have upon the fmoke that iffues from the crater of Vesuvius, elevated (as you know, Sir) more than 3600 feet. above the level of the fea; but, except the fmoke increasing confiderably and conftantly when the fea is agitated, and the wind blows from that quarter, the operations of Vefuvius appear to be very capricious and uncertain. One day there will be the appearance of a violent fermentation, and the next all is calmed again : but whenever the fmoke has been attended with confiderable ejections of fcoriæ and cinders, I have conftantly observed that the lava has foon after made its appearance, either by boiling over the crater, or forcing its paffage through crevices in the conical part of the volcano. As long as I remain in this country, and have the necessary affiltance of the abovementioned ingenious Monk (who is as excellent a draughtiman as he is an accurate and diligent observer) the Vefuvian diary fhall be continued; and I hope one day to have the honour of prefenting thefe curious manufcripts (which begin now to be voluminous) to the Royal Society, if it should think them worthy of a place in the Library of the society."

An account of a new Electrical Fifs. In a letter from Lieutenant William Paterion to Sir Joseph Banks, Bart. P. R. S. From the fame.

Sir, W HILE at the island of Johan-na, one of the Comora islands, in my way to the East-Indies, with the 98th regiment, I met with an electrical fifh, which has hitherto escaped the observation of naturalifts, and feems in many respects to differ from the electrical fifnes already defcribed; which induces me to fend you the following account of it, with a very imperfect drawing, and to beg that, if you think it deferves attention, you will do me the honour of prefenting it to the Royal Society. The fituation of a fubaltern officer, in an army upon foreign fervice, will, I hope, fufficiently apologize for my fending you to very imperfect a fketch of the fifh, which was made in the field, in a hot climate, under every difadvantage.

The fifth is feven inches long, two inches and a half broad, has a long projecting mouth, and feems to be of the genus Terrodon. The back of the fifth is a dark brown colour, the belly part of fea-green, the fides yellow, and the fins and tail of a fandy green. The body is interfperied with red, green, and white fpets, the white ones particularly bright; the eyes large, the iris red, its outer edge tinged with yellow.

The ifland of Johanna is fituated in latitude 1-2º 13' fouth. The coaft is wholly compoted of coral rocks, which are in many places hollowed by the fea. In these cavities I found feveral of the electrical fifnes. The water is about 56° or 60° of heat of Fahrenheit's thermometer. I caught two of them in a linen bag, clofed up at one end, and open at the other. In attempting to take one of them in my hand, it gave me fo fevere an electrical fhock, that I was obliged to quit my hold. I however fecured them both in the linen bag, and carried them to the camp, which was about two miles diftant. Upon my arrival there, one of them was found to be dead, and the other in a very weak flate, which made me auxious to prove, by the evidence of others, that it posselled the powers of clectricity, while it was yet alive. I had it put into a tub or water, and defired the furgeon of the regiment to lay hold of it between his hands; upon doing which he received an ovident electrical flroke. Afterwards the adjutant touched it with his finger upon the back, and felt a very flight fhock, but furficiently itrong to afcertain the fact.

After to very imperfect an acccunt, 1 will not trouble you with any any obfervations of my own upon this fingular fifh; but beg you will confider this only as a direction to others who may hereafter vifit that island, and from their fituation, and knowledge in natural hiftory, may be better able to deferibe the fifh, and give an account of its electrical organs.

I have the honour to be, with great effeem, &c.

W. PATERSON, Lieutenant 98th regiment.

Advertifement of the expected return of the Comet of 1532 and 1661 in the year 1788. By the Rev. Nevil Maskelyne, D. D. F. R. S. and Afronomer Royal. From the fame.

THE comet of 1531, 1607, and 1682, having returned in the year 1759, according to Dr. Halley's prediction in his Synopfis Aftronomiæ Cometicæ, first published in the Philosophical Transactions in 1705, and re-published with his Astronomical Tables in 1749, there is no reason to doubt that all the other comets will return after their proper periods, according to the remark of the fame author.

In the first edition of the Synopfis he fuppofed the comets of 1532 and 1661, from the fimilarity of the elements of their orbits, to be one and the fame; but in the facond edition he has feemed to leften the weight of his first conjecture by not repeating it. Probably he thought it beft to effablish this new point in aftronomy, the doctrine of the revolution of comets in elliptic orbits, as all philosophical matters in the beginning fhould be, on the most certain grounds; and feared that the vague obfervations of the comet, made by Apian in 1532, might rather detract from, than add to, the evidence ariting from more certain data. Aftronomers, however, have generally acquiefced in his first conjecture of the comets of 1532 and 1661 being one and the fame, and to expect its return to its perihelium accordingly in 17Sg.

The interval between the paffages of the comet by the perihelium in 1532 and 1661 is 128 years, 89 days, 1 hour, 29 minutes, (32 of the years being biffextile) which, added to the time of the perihelium in 1661, together with 11 days to reduce it from the Julian to the Gregorian file, which we now ufe, brings out the expected time of the next perihelium to be April 27th, 1 h. 10' in the year 1789.

The periodic times of the comet, which appeared in 1531, 1607, and 1682, having been of 76 and 75 years alternately, Dr. Halley fupposed, that the subsequent period would be of 76 years, and that it would return in the year 1758; but, upon confidering its near approach to Jupiter, in its defcent towards the fun in the fummer of 1681, he found, that the action of Jupiter upon the comet was, for feveral months together, equal to one-fiftieth part of the fun upon it, tending to increase the inclination of the orbit to the plane of the ecliptic, and lengthen the periodic time. Accordingly, the inclination of the orbit was found by the observations made in the following year 1682 to be 22' greater than in the year 1607. The effect of the augmentation of the periodic time could not be feen till the next return, which he fuppofed would be protracted by Jupiter's piter's action to the latter end of the year 1758, or the beginning of 1759. M. Clairaut, previous to its return, took the pains to calculate the actions both of Jupiter and Saturn on it during the whole periods from 1607 to 1682, and from 1682 to 1759, and thence predicted its return to its perihelium by the middle of April; it came about the middle of March, only a month fooner, which was a fufficient approximation to the truth in fo delicate a matter, and did honour to this great mathematician, and his laborious calculations.

The comet in queffion is alfo, from the position of its orbit, liable to be much diffurbed both by Jupiter and Saturn, particularly in its afcent from the fun after paffing its perihelium, if they should happen to be near it, when it approaches to or croffes their orbits; becaufe it is very near the plane of them at that time. When it paffed the orbit of Jupiter in the beginning of February 1682, O. S. it was 50° in confequentia of that planet; and when it passed the orbit of Saturn in the beginning of October 1663, it was 17° in consequentia of it. Hence its motion would be accelerated while it was approaching towards the orbit of either planet by its separate action, and retarded when it had paffed its orbit; but, as it would be fubjected to the effect of retardation through a greater part of its orbit than to that of acceleration, the former would exceed the latter, and confequently the periodic time would be fhortened; but probably not much, on account of the confiderable diftance of the comet from the planets when it paffed by them; and therefore we may flil expect it to return to its perihelium in the beginning of the year 1789, or the latter end of the year 1788, and certainly fome time before the 27th of April 178g. But of this we shall be better informed after the end of this year, from the answers to the prize queltion proposed by the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, to compute the diffurbances of the comet of 1532 and 1661, and thence to predict its return *.

If it should come to its perihelium on the 1st of January 1789, it might probably be visible, with a good achromatic telescope, in its defcent to the fun, the middle of September 1788, and fooner or later, according as its perihelium should be sooner or later. It will approach us from the fouthern parts of its orbit, and therefore will firft appear with confiderable fouth latitude and fouth declination; fo that perfons refiding nearer the equator than we do, or in fouth latitude, will have an opportunity of difcovering it before us. It is to be wished that it may be first feen by fome aftronomer in fuch a fituation, and furnished with proper instruments for fettling its place in the heavens, the earlieft good obfervations being molt valuable for de-

* Since this was written, I received the unwelcome news, in a letter from M. Mechain, of the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris, that the Academy has not received faitsfactory answers concerning the diftubances of the comet between 1532 and 1661, and 1661 and the approaching return, and that the prize is referred to be adjudged of at Easter 1788, and that it will be 6000 livres. N. M.

terming its elliptic orbit, and proving its identity with the comets of 1532 and 1661. The Cape of Good Hope would be an excellent fituation for this purpole.

In order to affift affronomers in looking out for this comet, I have here given its heliocentric and geocentric longitudes and latitudes, and correspondent distances from the fun and earth, on supposition that it shall come to its perihelium on January 1, 1783. But if that should happen fooner or later, the heliocentric longitudes and latitudes, and distances from the fun, will stand good if applied to days as much earlier or later, as the time of the perihelium may happen fooner or later; and the geocentric longitudes and latitudes, and diffances from the earth, mult be re-computed accordingly. The calculations are made for a parabolic orbit from the elements, determined by Dr. Halley from Hevelius's obfervations in 1651, only allowing for the preceflion of the equinoxes. The elements made use of were as follows:

Time of perihelium January 1; 1789, at noon.

Inclination of orbit to the ecliptic 32° 36'.

Perihelium forwarder in orbit than the afcending node 33° 28'. Its motion is direct.

Computed places of the Comet, on Supposition that it shall return to its peribelium January 1, 1789, at noon.

The last observation made by Hevelius on the contet in 1661 was when its diffance from the earth was 0,986, and from the fun 1,37, with what he calls a very long and good telefcope; at which time it appeared faint and finall with it, though fill fufficiently vifible. Let us fuppofe this to have been a telescope of 9-feet focal length, with an aperture of 1,65 inch ; then, becaufe the diameter of the aperture of a telefcope fufficient to render the comet equally visible fhould be as the product of its diftances from the fun and earth, and the product of the numbers abovementioned 0,986 and 1,37 is 1,35, we shall have the following analogy to find the aperture of a refracting telescope fufficient to shew the comet as it appeared to Hevelius. As 1,35 : 1,65 inch :: 9 : 11 inches, fo is the product of diffances from the fun and earth to the diameter of the aperture required in inches.

Observations on Longevity. Br Anthony Fethergill, M. D. F. R. S. Communicated in a Letter to Dr. Percival. From Memoirs of the Literary and Philosophical Society of Manchefter.

Dear Sir,

Have often thought, it would be an uteful undertaking to col-

left into one point of view the memorable infrances of long-lived perfons, whole ages are recorded by monumental micriptions, biographical writings, or even by the publie prints. The only judicious attempt I have yet feen of this kind, was by the ingenious Mir. Whitehurft, a few years ago, in his Inquiry into the Origin and Formation of the Earth. To the examples of longevity mentioned by him, as collefted by a perion of veracity from the above fources, I have now added fundry remarkable inftances of a fimilar kind, as they have occurred to me in the courie of reading; and have annexed the authorities, (fo far as was practicable) that you may be enabled to judge of the degree of credibility, that may feem due to the refpective facts, and of the allowance which it may appear necoffary to make, for that natural propenfity, which mankind have ever betrayed for the marvellous. Now, admitting that many of the ages mov have been fomewhat exaggerated. yet full there can be no possible doubt, that even thefe have extended for beyoud the ordinary period of life, and may therefore be entitled to a place in the following tables, which I fubmic to your consideration, as a fmall fpccimen of what taight be more worthy your attention, if conducted hereafter on a larger scale, and purfued with chronological accuracy.

If we look back to an early period of the chriftian æra, we fhall find that Italy has been, at leaft about that time, peculiarly propitious to longevity. Lord Bacon obferves, that the year of our Lord 76, in the reign of Veſpaſian, was memorable; for in that year was a taxing, which afforded the moſt authentic method of knowing the ages of men. From it, there were found in that part of Italy, lying between the Apennine mountains and the river Po, one hundred and twentyfour perfons who either equalled or exceeded one hundred years of age, namely :

Mr. Carew, in his furvey of Cornwall, affures us, that it is no unufual thing, with the inhabitants of that county, to reach ninety years of age and upwards, and even to retain their ftrength of body, and perfect ufe of their fenfes. Befides Brown, the Cornifh beggar, who lived to one hundred and twenty, and one Polezew to one hundred and thirty years of age, he remembered the deceafe of four perfons in his own parish, the fum of whose years, taken collectively, amounted to three hundred and forty. Now, although longevity evidently prevails more in certain districts than in others, yet it is, by no means, confined to any particular nation or climate; nor are there wanting inflances of it, in almost every quarter of the globe, as appears from the preceding, as well as the subsequent table.

Evan Williams CarmarthenWork-Gen. Gazetteer, Oct. : houfe, still alive 1782.	Evan Williams	Carmarthen	Work-Gen. Gazetteer, Oct. 12,

The antediluvians are purpofely omitted, as bearing too little reference to the prefent race of mortals, to afford any fatisfactory conclutions; and the improbable flories of fome perfons, who have almost rivalled them in modern times, border too much upon the marvellous, to find a place in these tables. The prefent examples are abundantly fufficient to prove, that longevity does not depend fo much, as has been supposed, on any particular climate, fituation, or occupation in life. For we fee, that it often prevails in places where all thefe are extremely diffimilar; and it would, moreover, be very difficult, in the hiftories of the feveral perfons above-mentioned; to find any circumfance common to them all, except, perhaps, that of being born of healthy parents, and of being inured to daily labour, temperance, and fimplicity of diet. Among the inferior ranks of mankind, therefore, fore, rather than amongst the fons of eafe, and luxury, shall we find the most numerous instances of longevity; even frequently, when other external circumstances seem extremely unfavourable: as in the cafe of the poor fexton of Peterborough, who, notwithstanding his unpromifing occupation among dead bodies, lived long enough to bury two crowned heads, and to furvive two complete generations*. The livelihood of Henry Jenkins, and old Parr, is faid to have confifted chiefly of the coarfest fare, as they depended on precarious alms. Τo which may be added, the remarkable instance of Agnes Milburne, who, after bringing forth a nume-rous offspring, and being obliged, through extreme indigence, to pafs the latter part of her life in St. Luke's work-houfe, yet reached her hundred and fixth year, in that fordid, unfriendly fituation +. The plain diet, and invigorating employments of a country life, are acknowledged, on all hands, to be highly conducive to health and longevity, while the luxury and refinements of large cities are allowed to be equally deftructive to the human fpecies: and this confideration alone, perhaps, more than counterbalances all the boafted privileges, of fuperior elegance and civilization, refulting from a city life.

From country villages, and not from crouded cities, have the preceding inflances of longevity been chiefly fupplied. Accordingly it appears from the London bills of mortality, during a period of thirty years, viz. from the year 1728 to 1758, the fum of the deaths amounted to 750,322, and that, in all this prodigious number, only two hundred and forty-two perfons furvived the hundredth year of their age! This overgrown metropolis is computed, by my learned friend Dr. Price, to contain a ninth part of the inhabitants of England, and to confume annually feven thousand perfons, who remove into it from the country every year, without increasing it. He moreover obferves, that the number of inhabitants in England and Wales has diminished, about one fourth part, fince the revolution, and fo rapidly of late, that, in eleven years, near 200,000 of our common people have been loft #! If the calculation be just, however alarming it may appear in a national view, there is this confolation, when confidered in a philofophical light, that without partial evil, there can be no general good; and that, what a nation lofes in the fcale of population at one period, it gains at another; and thus, probably, the average number of inhabitants on the furface of the globe continues, at all times, nearly the same. By this medium the world is neither overstocked with inhabitants, nor kept too thin, but life and death keep a tolerably equal pace. The inhabitants of this illand, comparatively speaking, are but as the duft of the balance; yet, inflead of being diminished, we are affored by other writers, that within thefe thirty years, they are greatly increafed [].

The defice of felf-prefervation. and of protracting the thort span of life, is fo intimately interwoven with our conditution, that it is justly cileemed one of the first principles of our nature, and in fpite even of pain and milery, feldom quits us to the last moments of our existence. It feems, therefore, to be no lefs our duty than our interest, to examine minutely into the various means that have been confidered as conducive to health and long life; and, if poffible, to diffinguith fuch circumstances as are estential to that great end, from those which are merelv accidental. But here, it is much to be regretted, that an accurate hiftory of the lives of all the remarkable perfons in the above table, fo far as relates to the diet, regimen, and the use of the nonnaturals, has not been faithfully handed down to us; without which, it is impoffible to draw the necessary inferences. Is it not then a matter of aftonishment, that historians and philotophers have hitherto paid for little attention to longevity? If the prefent imperfect list flould excite others, of more leiture and better abilities, to undertake a full investigation of fo interesting a fubjest, the enquiry might prove not only curious, but highly useful to mankind. In order to furnific materials for a future history of longevity, the bills of mortality, throughout the kingdom, ought first to be revised, and put on a better fcoting; agreeably to the foreme, which you pointed out fome time ago, and of which Manchefter and Chefter have already given a specimen, highly worthy of imitation. The plan, however, might be further improved, with very little trouble, by adding a particular account of the diet and regimen of every perfon who dies at eighty years of age or upwards, and mentioning whether his parents were healthy, longlived people, &c. &c. An accurate regifter thus ettablished throughout the British dominions, would be productive of many important advantages to fociety, not only in a medical and philosophical, but alfo in a political and moral view. It is therefore to be hoped, that the legislature will not long delay taking an object of such great utility into their ferious confideration.

All the circumfiances that are most offentially neceffary to life, may be comprifed under the fix tollowing heads:

- I. Air and climate.
- 2. Meat and drink.
- 3. Motion and reft.
- 4. Sleep and watching.
- 5. The fecretions and excretions.
- 6. Affections of the mind.

Thefe, though all perfectly natural to the conflictution, have by writers been flyled non-neturals, by a firange perversion of language; and have been all copioufly handled under that improper term. However, it may not be amilis to offer a few fhort obfervations on each, as they are fo immediately connected with the prefent fubject.

1. Air, &c.—It has long been known, that fresh air is mere immediately necessary to life than feod; for a man may live two or three days without the latter, but not many minutes without the former. The vivifying principle contained in the atmosphere, so effential to the support of flame, as well as animal life, concerning which authors authors have proposed fo many conjectures, appears now to be nothing elfe but that pure dephlogiflicated fluid lately difcovered by that ingenious philosopher, Dr. Priestley. The common atmosphere may well be supposed to be more or lets healthy, in proportion as it abounds with this animating principle. As this exhales, in copious streams, from the green leaves of all kinds of vegetables, even from those of the most poifonous kind, may we not, in fome meafure, account why instances of longevity are fo much more frequent in the country than in great cities, where the air, inftead of partaking fo largely of this falutary impregnation, is daily contaminated with noxious animal effluvia, and phlogifton ?

With respect to climate, various observations conspire to prove, that those regions, which lie within the temperate zones, are best calculated to promote long life. Hence, perhaps, may be explained, why Italy has produced fo many long livers, and why iflands in general are more falutary than continents; of which Bermudas, and fome others, afford examples. And it is a pleafing circumstance, that our own island appears from the above table, (notwithstanding the fudden vicifitudes to which it is liable) to contain far more inflances of longevity than could well be imagined. The ingenious Mr. Whitehurft affures us, from certain facts, that Englishmen are, in general, longer lived than North Americans; and, that a Britifh constitution will last longer, even in that climate, than a native one *. But it must be allowed in general, that the human confitution is adapted to the peculiar flate and temperature of each refpective climate; fo that no part of the habitable globe can be pronounced too hot, or too cold, for its inhabitants. Yet, in order to promote a friendly intercourfe between the most remote regions, the Author of Nature has wifely enabled the inhabitants to endure great and furprifing changes of temperature with impunity †.

2. Foods and drink.-Though foods and drink of the moft fimple kinds are allowed to be the best calculated for the fupporting the body in health, yet it can hardly be doubted, but variety may be fafely indulged occasionally, provided men would reftrain their appetites within the bounds of temperance. For bountiful nature cannot be supposed to have poured forth fuch a rich profution of provisions, merely to tantalize the human fpecies, without attributing to her the part of a cruel step-dame, instead of that of the kind and indulgent parent. Befides, we find, that by the wonderful powers of the digeflive organs, a variety of animal and vegetable fubitances, of very difcordant principles, are happily affimilated into one bland homogeneous chyle; therefore, it feems natural to diffruft thefe cynical writers, who would rigidly confine mankind to one fimple dith, and their drink to the mere water of the brook. Nature, it is true, has pointed out that mild, infipid fluid, as the univerfal diluent; and, therefore, most admirably adapted for our daily beverage. But experience has equally proved, that vinous and spiritous liquors, on certain occafions, are no lefs inlutary and beneficial, whether it be to fupport ftrength againit ficknefs, or bodily fatigue, or to exhilarate the mind under the preffure of heavy misfortunes. But alas! what nature meant for innocent and useful cordials, to be used only occasionally, and according to the direction of reafou; cultom and caprice have, by degrees, rendered habitual to the human frame, and liable to the moft enormous and destructive abuses? Hence, it may be justly doubted, whether gluttony and intemperance have not depopulated the world, more than even fword, peftilence, and famine. True, therefore, is the old maxim, " Modus utendi ex veneno facit Medicamentum, ex Medicamento, venenum."

3. und 4. Motion and reft, fleep and watching .- It is allowed, on all hands, that alternate motion and reit, and fleep and watching, are neceffary conditions to health and longevity; and that they ought to be adapted to age, temperament, conflitution, temperature of the chimate, &c. but the errors which mankind daily commit in these respects become a fruitful fource of difeases. While some are bloated and relaxed with ease and indolence, others are emaciated, and become rigid, thro' hard labour, watching, and fatigue.

quantity of aliment taken in, in a given time, that the body is found to return daily to nearly the fame weight. If any particular evacuation happen to be preternaturally diminified, fome other evacuation is proportionally augmented, and the equilibrium is commonly preferved; but continued irregularities in these important functions cannot but terminate in difease.

6. Affections of the mind.—The due regulation of the paffions, perhaps, contributes more to health and longevity, than that of any other of the non-naturals. The animating paffions, fuch as joy, hope, love, &c. when kept within proper bounds, gently excite the nervous influence, promote an equable circulation, and are highly conducive to health; while the deprefing affections, fuch as fear, grief, and defpair, produce the contrary effect, and lay the foundation of the moft formidable difeafes.

From the light which hiftory affords us, as well as from fome inflances in the above table, there is great reafon to believe, that longevity is, in a great meafure, hereditary; and that healthy, long-lived parents would commonly transmit the fame to their children, were it not for the frequent errors in the non-naturals, which fo evidently tend to the abbreviation of human life.

Whence is it, but from thefe caufes, and the unnatural modes of living, that, of all the children which are born in the capital cities of Europe, nearly one half die in early infancy? To what elfe can we attribute this extraordinary mortality? Such an amazing proportion of premature deaths is a circumftance unheard of among favage nations, nations, or among the young of other animals! In the earlieft ages, we are informed, that human life was protracted to a very extraordinary length; yet how few perfons, in these later times, arrive at that period which nature feems to have defigned ! Man is, by nature, a field-animal, and feems defined to rife with the fun, and to fpend a large portion of his time in the open air, to inure his body to robuft exercises, and the inclemency of the feafons, and to make a plain homely repait, only when hunger dictates. But art has fludioufly defeated the kind intentions of nature; and by enflaving him to all the blandilhments of fenfe, has left him, alas! an eafy victim to folly and caprice ! To enumerate the various abufes, which take place from the earlieft infancy, and which are continued through the fucceeding flages of modifh life, would carry me far beyond my prefent intention. Suffice it to obferve, that they prevail more particularly among people, who are the most highly polified and refined .--To compare their artificial mode of life, with that of nature, or even with the long livers in the lift, would, probably, afford a very ftriking contraft; and, at the fame time, fupply an additional reafon why, in very large cities, inflances of longevity are fo very rare. Of late years, the increasing luxury and diffipation of the age, no longer confined to the metropolis, have fpread their contagion far and wide into the country, fo as to afford the fage divine, and fpeculative moralift, a more melancholy profpect of the apparent degeneracy of the human race, than perhaps was ever before exhibited*!

That fo complicated a machine, as the human body, fo delicate in its texture, and fo exquifitely formed in all its parts, fhould continue. for fo many years, to perform its various functions, even under the most prudent conduct, is not a little furprizing : but that it fhould ever hold out to any advanced period, under all the rude fhocks it fo often meets with from riot and intemperance, which lay it open to all the various " ills that flefh is heir to," is fill more truly miraculous! But here, perhaps, it may be alledged, that it never can be supposed, all the long livers purfued one uniform, regular course of life, fince it is well known, that fome of the most noted ones were fometimes guilty of great deviations from strict temperance and regularity. Let not this, however, encourage the giddy libertines of the prefent age to hope to render their continued scenes of intemperance and debauchery compatible with health and longevity. The duties and occupations of life will not, indeed, permit the generality of mankind to live by rule,

* I fay apparently, because mankind, in reality, have been equally prone to vice and folly in all ages; only these have assumed different appearances, according to the tafte and manners of the times : not that the human heart has been fuccessively growing more and more depraved, as the poet fatirically exclaims,

Ætas parentum, pejor avis, tulit Nos nequiores; mox daturos Progeniem vitiofiorem! Hor, Lib, III. Ode 6. and Jubi. St therefelves to a precife regenier. Fortuately, this is not neceffary : for the divine Architect has, with infinite wildom, rendered the human frame fo ductile, as to admit of a very confiderable latirule of kealth; yet this has its bounds, which none can long tranfprefs with impunity. For if old Parr, notwithstanding fome excelles and irregularities, arrived at fo aftonishing an age, yet we have reason to suppose that these were far from being habitual; and may alfo conclude, that had it not been for these abuses, his life might have been still confiderably protracted.

On the whole, though fome few exceptions may occur to what has been already advanced, yet it will be found, in general, that all extremes are unfriendly to health and longevity. Exceffive heat enervates the body; extreme cold renders it torpid : floth and inactivity clog the neceffary movements of the machine; inceffant labour foon wears it out. On the other hand, a temperate climate, moderate exercife, pure country air, and flrict temperance, together with a prudent regulation of the paffions, will prove the most efficacious means of protracting life to its utmost limits .---Now if any of these require more peculiar attention than the reft, it is, undoubtedly, the laft: for the focial paffions, like gentle gales, fan the brittle vestel calmly along the ocean of life, while, on the other hand, rough, turbulent ones dash it upon rocks and quickfands. Hence, perhaps, it may be explained, why the cultivation of philofophy, mufic, and the fine aris, all which manifelily tend to humanize the foul, and to calm the rougher paffions, are fo highly conducive to longevity. And, finally, why there is no fure method of fecuring that habitual calmnefs and ferenity of mind, which conflitute true happinefs, and which are, at the fame time, fo effential to health and long life, without virtue.

Instead of dilating them with theories and cafes, which would add only to the number of books, but not to the flock of facts, I fend them to you in as fhort a compass as possible. They are not io fit for the public eye as I could wifh; but if you think them worthy of a place in your Transactions, you are welcome to them.

Be affured, Dear Sir, of the great regard of your friend and humble fervant, Philadelphia, July 22, 1785.

Refult of Observations, &c.

1. The principal difeafes were putrid fevers. Men, who came into the hofpitals with pleurifies, rheumatifms, &c. foon loft the types of their original difeafes, and tuffered, or died, with the putrid fever.

2. This putrid fever was often artificial, produced by the want of fufficient room and cleanlinefs.

3. It always prevailed most, and with the worft fymptoms, in winter: a free air, which could only be obtained in fummer, always prevented or checked it.

4. Soldiers, billeted in private houfes, efcaped it, and generally recovered foonest from all their difeafes.

5. Convalescents, and drunken foldiers, were most exposed to putrid fevers.

6. The remedies that appeared to do most fervice in this difease, were tartar emetic in the beginning, gentle doses of laxative falts, bark, wine, (two or three bottles a day in many cases) and fal volatile.

7. In all those cafes where the contagion was received, cold teldom failed to render it active. Whenever an hospital was removed in winter, one half of the patients generally fickened in the way, or ioon after their arrival at the place to which they were fent.

8. The army, when it lay in tents, was always more fickly than when it lay in the open air : it was always more healthy when kept in metion, than when it lay in an encampment.

9. Million officers, and foldiers, who enjoyed health during a campaign, were often feized with fevers upon their return to the wita mellis, at their respective homes. There was one inflance of a militia captain, who was feized with convulfions the first night he lay on a reather-bed, after lying feveral months on a matrais and on the ground. The fever was produced by the fudden change in the manner of fleeping, living, &c. It was prevented, in many cafes, by the perfon lying, for a few nights after his return to his family, on a blanket before the fire.

10. I met with feveral inflances of buboes, and ulcers in the throat, as deferibed by Dr. Don. Monro: they were mittaken by fome of the junior furgeons for venereal fores, but they yielded to the common remedies of putrid fevers.

Observations on the use of Acids in bleaching of Linen. By Dr. Eafon. From the foregoing work.

THE use of acids in bleaching of linen, has been long known. Formerly milk was chiefly employed; but it had feveral inconveniences. The quantity requisite could fcarcely be obtained; its effect was flow; and, containing animal matter, it was apt to rot and spoil the cloth.

About thirty years ago it was difcovered, that the foffil acids, when properly diluted with water, anfwered much better, and would do more in a few hours, than animal acids could do in a week, in facilitating the whitening of cloth.

At first it was imagined that the mineral acids would be apt to burn or corrode linen substances, when immersed in them. But experience foon dispelled such fears, and convinced bleachers, that, by proper management, the danger was next to none.

According to the firength of the acids, they muft be mixed with water, fometimes to feven hundred times their bulk.

The nitrous acid, being the most corrofive, and most expensive, has not been used. The vitriolic acid is that which has univerfally been employed: not becaufe it is preferable to the muriatic acid, but becaufe it was to be bought in large quantities, and at a finall expense.

The muriatic acid being now fold nearly as cheap as the vitriolic, and anfwering in a fuperior degree, will, in a fhort time, f am convinced, be generally adopted by bleachers.

As I must confess my ignorance in the art of bleaching, it may feem prefumptuous in me to hazard a conjecture concerning the manner in which acids act in whitening cloth; but it seems probable, that alkaline falts, which are used in washing out the oil and glutinous parts of flax, on which the green colour depends, deposit an earth in the pores of the cloth. As it is known that acids will also diffolve the earthy parts of vegetables, that acid fhould be preferred which will keep earthy particles fuspended in water. The vitriolic, therefore, is not fo proper ; because, with earthy fubstances, it forms immediately a felenite, a fubstance only foluble in a very large quantity of water. This felenitic matter, adhering to the threads of the cloth, will injure it, and make it feel hard to the touch.

When the muriatic acid is used, no scientite is formed. Whatever quantity of earthy matter is diffolved by it, is easily washed out by pure fost water, and the cloth having a fost filky feel, feems to Brengthen this conjecture.

As the muriatic acid is now fold at three-pence per pound, and the common vitriolic acid at four-peace halfpenny; and as the muriatic acid will, in proportion, acidulate a larger quantity of water than the vitriolic, befides the great probability of its anfwering better in whitening of cloth, the bleachers in this part of the world would do well to give it a fair trial.

Experiments and Objervations on Forments and Formentation; by which a Mode of exciting Formentation in Malt Liquors, without the aid of Youf, is pointed cut; with an Attempt to form a new Theory of that Process. By Thomas Henry, F. R. S. From the fame.

LUCRETIUS.

F all the proceffes of chemistry, there is, perhaps, none, the phenomena of which have been lefs fatisfactorily explained, than those of fermentation. The writers on chemistry have been content to deferibe the feveral appearances, the progrefs and refult of fermentation, and have declined any inquiry into its primary causes, or into the mode by which the changes, induced by it, are effected in bodies, which are the ol jects of its action.

Within these few years, great changes have taken place in the theory of chemistry. The important difcoveries of Black and Prieftley, and of feveral other philofophical chemists, who have endeavouled to emulate their examples, have happily explained many of the operations of chemistry, which were, before, wholly unintelligible : and the prefent time forms one of the most distinguished æras in the history of that icience. We now understand the nature of lime and of alkalis; the difference between a metal and its calx; the caufe of the increase of weight in the latter, and of its decreafe when returned to a metallic form. The conflitution of atmospheric air has been demonstrated .- Various gales, refembling air in many points, but differing from it in others, have been discovered; and, among thefe, an athereal fluid, fuperior in its properties to common air, and capable of supporting life and combuiltion more vigoroufly and durably. Our acquaintance with this pure fluid, which forms the vital part of common air, feems to promife much enlargement to our chemical knowledge, in the inveftigation of its various combinations; and we have already derived much information, relative to the conftitution of the acids, and of water, from the refearches of philosophers into the nature of pure air.

Of the gales which have fo much engaged the attention of the pneumatic chemifts, fixed air, or, as it has more properly been denominated by Sir Torbern Bergman, aërich acid, acid, was that which first attracted their notice. This gas, which had been remarked, even by Van Helmont, to be difcharged in great quantities from liquors, in the vinous fermentation, was found by Dr. Prießley to be again mifcible with them; and he proved that, on the prefence of this gas, the briftnefs and pleafantneis of thefe liquors depended, and that, when deprived of it, they became vapid and flat

But though the Hon. Mr. Cavendifh had proved the feparation, and afcertained the quantity of this gas, difcharged in fermentation, and though Dr. Prietley had early made the above-mentioned obfervations, it does not appear to have occurred to thefe philophers, that this gas was the exciting caufe, as well as the product, of fermentation.

It is a fact well known to brewers of malt-liquors, that wort, contrary to what takes place in liquors more purely faccharine, as the juice of the grape, cannot be brought into the vinous fermentation, without the addition of a ferment; for which purpofe yeaft or barm, which is a vifcid frothy fabilance, taken from the furface of other maffes of fermenting liquor, has been commouly ufed.

But the nature of this fubftance, much lefs its mode of action, his not been confidered with that degree of attention, which one would have expected fhould have been excited by fo extraordinary an agent. We are told indeed, that a vinous ferment induces the vinous, that a ferment of an acctous kind brings on the acetous fermentation, and a putrid one, that fermentation which ends in putrefaction. But we receive no more information relative to the manner in which they produce these effects, than we do with regard to fermentation itself.

Before I endeavour to deliver any theory of ferments or of fermentation, I fhall relate a number of facts which have led to a few thoughts on the fubiect; and having mentioned the phenomena attendant on the process, as described by other chemists, thall then proceed to offer an hypothesis, with the greatest diffidence-a diffidence which nothing could enable me to furmount, but the kind indulgence I have fo often experienced in this fociety. And on no occasion have I flood more in need of their candour than on the prefent one; as the obfcurity and intricacy of the path, on which L am entering, the almost total want of guides, and my inadequate abilities to clear away the obfacles, throw light on the dark parts, and point out those that may be traverfed with eafe and certainty, place me in a fituation truly difficult. Indeed I was in hopes to have rendered what I have to offer lefs maperfect, but my fon's unfortunate accident has forengaged mythoughts, end added to much to my necessary avecations, that I have been able to devote lut a finall portion of my time to feientific pulfaits.

Soon after Dr. Priedley had pablifted his method of impregnating water with fixed air, I began to prepare artificial Pyrmont water, by that means ; and early obferved that water, fo impregnated, though it at first showed no sparkling when poured into a glass, yet after it had been kept in a bottle, clofely corked, for iome days, exhibited, when opened, the sparkling appearance of the three Pyrmont water. 76

ter *. This I attributed, and perhaps not unjuftly, to the gas, which had been more intimately combined with the water, and reduced to a kind of latent flate, recovering its eladicity, and endeavouring to efcape.

Having one day made some punch with this water, and having about a pint of it remaining, after my friends had retired I put it into a bottle, capable of containing a quart, and corked the bottle. On opening it, at the diffance of three or four days, the liquor, when poured out, creamed and mantled, like the brifkeft bottled cyder. An old gentleman, to whom I gave a half pint glafs full of it, called out in raptures to know what delicious liquor he had been drinking, and earnettiv defired that, if I had any more of the fame, I would give him another glafs.

Dr. Prieftley, as has been already mentioned, had informed us that fixed air, thrown into wine or malt liquor, grown vapid, reftored to them their brifknefs and pleafant tafte. On impregnating fome vapid ale with fixed air, 1 was difappointed in not finding the effect immediately produced. But after bootling the ale, and keeping it clofely flopped for four or five days, it was become as brifk as ale which, in the common way, has been bottled feveral months.

In the year 1778, I impregnated with fixed air a quantity of milk whey, which I had clarified for the purpofe of preparing fome fugar of milk, and bottled it. In about a week, the whey in one of the bottles, which had been to loofely corked, that the liquor had partly cozed out, was remarkably brick and fparkling. Another bottle, which was not opened till the fummer of 1782, contained the liquor not in to brick a thate, but become evidently vincus, and without the leaft acidity, perceptible to the tafte.

I now began to fufpect that fixed air is the efficient caule of fermentation; or, in other words, that the properties of yeaft, as a ferment, depend on the fixed air it contains; and that yeaft is little else than fixed air, enveloped in the mucilaginous parts of the fermenting liquor. I therefore determined to attempt the making of artificial yeaft.

For this purpole, I boiled wheatflour and water to the confiftence of a thin jelly, and, putting the mixture into the middle part of Nooth's machine, impregnated it with fixed air, of which it imbibed a confiderable quantity. The mixture was then put into a bottle, loofely ftopped, and placed in a moderate heat.

The next day the mixture was in a flate of fermentation, and, by the third day, had acquired fo much of the appearance of yeaft, that I added to it a proper quantity of flour, kneaded the pafte, and after fuffering it to fland, during five or fix hours, baked it, and the product was bread, tolerably well fermented.

I now determined to make a more fatisfactory experiment. The wort, obtained from malt, it is known cannot be brought into a fate of fermentation, without the aid of a ferment; for which purpole yeaft is always ufed. If, therefore, by impregnating wort with fixed air, I could bring on the vinous fermeatation, if I could carry on this fermentation fo as to produce ale, and, from the ale, procure ardent fpirit, I imagined that I should be able to announce to the world a mode of procuring newly-fermented liquors, in most climates and in most situations.

I accordingly procured from a public-houle two gallons of flrong wort. It had a difagreeable bitter tafte, owing either to bad hops, or to fome substitute for hops. A large part of the liquor was impregnated, in Nooth's machine, with fixed air, which it feemed to abforb very rapidly and in large quantity. When it was thus impregnated, it was mixed with the other part, and poured into a large earthen jug, the mouth of which was flopped with a cloth, and placed in a degree of heat, varying from 70° to 80°. In twenty-four hours the liquor was in brifk fermentation, a firing head of yeaft began to colleft on its furface; and, on the third day, it appeared to be in a flate fit for tunning. It was therefore put into an earthen veffel, such as is used in this country by the common people as a substitute for a barrel, for containing their small brewings of fermented liquors. During the fpace of near a week, previous to the flopping up of this veffel, much yeaft was collected on its furface, and occasionally taken off; and by means of this yeaft, I fermented wheat flour, and procured as good bread as I could have obtained by using an equal quantity of any other yeaft.

The veffel was now flopped up; and in about a 'month tapped. The liquor was well fermented, had a head or cream on its furface; and though, as might be expected from the defeription of the wort, not very pleafant, yet as much fo, as the generality of the ale brewed at public-houfes.

A part of the ale was fabmitted to difillation; and, from it, a quantity of vinous fpirit was produced, which is fubmitted to the examination of the fociety. But the verfel being broken before the difillation was finihed, the quantity it would have yielded was not afcertained. However, that which was obtained, appeared not to differ much in quantity from what an equal portion of common ale would have afforded.

As I had loft my notes, and was obliged to make out the preceding account from memory, I defigned to repeat the experiments again ; but various engagements prevented me, till the latter end of August 1784. Of these experiments the following notes are taken from my journal:

August 30, I procured two gallons of common ale wort, two quarts or which were, in the evening, impregnated, but not faturated, with fixed air. The impregnated liquor was then added to the other part, and, about midnight, placed in a large jug, within the air of the kitchen nre, where it remained duing the night. In the merning no fights of fermentation. At five o'clock P. M. only a flight mantling on the surface. Apprehending the quantity of gas to have been too fmall, a botcle, with a perforated stopper and valve, containing an efferveicing mixture of chalk and vitrielle acid, was let down into the.

the wort. At nine o'c'ock, the difcharge of air, from the bottle, was going on brill, and the wort Reemed to be fermenting. At eleven o'clock the bottle was withdrawn, the fermentation being commenced I evond a doubt ; the furface of the liquor having a pretty firong head. Temperature of the wort So<sup>o</sup>-at the outfide of the veffel 78°.

September 11l, feven o'clock, A. M. the fire having been low during the night, the termentation was lefs brifk-temperature of the wort reduced to 72, and probably had been lower during the night, as the fire was now increafed. The liquor was flirred up, placed in a fituation where the thermometer pointed to $2°, and the effervelcing mixture was again immerfed. - ŧt was withdrawn at noon, and the thermometer flanding at 92°, the wort was removed further from the fire-At four o'clock, P. M. the head of yeast was firong, and at eleven o'clock was increased,

September 2d, nine o'clock. A. M. the liquor was indged to be In a proper flate for tunning. It was accordingly removed into the vetiel before deferibed, and carried into the cellar at eleven-at noon, a high head of yeaft was running over the top of the veffel-fome of it was taken of, and in two hours the head was equally fron r.

September 3d, the fermentation proceeded regularly this day; and on the 4th I had collected to much yeaft as to make a loaf with it, which, when baked, weighed about two pounds. The loaf was well fermented, good bread, having no peculiar tafte, except a flight bitternels, proceeding from the wort having had too large a propertion of hops. Though, from the time in which the yeaft had been collecting from fo fmall a quantity of liquor, its fermenting power might have been expected to have been impaired.

September 5th, the liquor was again covered with a plentiful head of yeaft; and the fermentation was fuffered to proceed to the 12th, when the veffel was closed, in the utual manner.

l intended, in a few weeks, to have committed the liquor to diftillation; but my thoughts were unfortunately directed to an object which engaged my most anxious attention; and my wort was negledied till the latter end of February ; when, on tapping the veffel, the liquor, from having been kept fo long, under fach difadvantageous circumflances, and, perhaps, from too great heat in the fermentation, and the too long continuance of it, had paded from the vinous to the acetous flate, and was become excellent alegar.

As I had obtained a vinous fpirit from the former parcel of wort, I was not forry for this event, as it was going a flep farther than I expedled. For I had now obtained yeait, bread, ale, ardent fpirit, and acetous acid. A frecimen of the laft is now produced to the fociety.

I flatter myfelf that these experiments may be of extensive utility, and contribute to the accommodation, the pleafure, and the health of men, in various fituations, who have hitherto, in a great degree, been precluded from the ufe of fermented liquors; and be the means of furnishing important articles of diet, and of medicine. Not only at fea, but in many fituations in the country, and at particular feafons, yeah is not to be procured. Bу

By the means I have fuggested, in these experiments, fresh bread and newly fermented malt or faccharine liquors may at any time be procured; and of how much importance this may be, and how great the improvement to the malt decoctions recommended by the late Dr. Macbride, I shall not at present ftay to expatiate on ; as the fubject may be too much connected with the practical part of physic, to come within the limitations drawn by the fociety. But, in domestic œconomy, its uses are very obvious; and perhaps none more fo than the ready mode which the preceding experiments teach, of reviving fermentation when too languid-the finking of a bottle, fuch as I have described in my effay on the prefervation of water at fea, &c.* with an effervefcing mixture of chalk and vitriolic acid, appearing to be fully adequate to the purpofe, and would, I believe, be fufficient for impregnating the wort, without any other contrivance. This difcovery therefore may, perhaps, be of no fmall utility in public breweries, and I would recommend it to the attention of perfons concerned in the brewing trade.

Let us now proceed to defcribe the circumflances neceffary to, and the phenomena attending fermentation, as defcribed by chemical writers; and then endeavour to form fome theory which may account for them.

Sugar, the juices of ripe fruit, and malt, are all more or lefs difpofed to run into fermentation. But before this can take place, it is neceffary they fhould be diluted with water, fo as to bring them to a liquid state. A due degree of heat is also requisite, as the fermentation fucceeds best when the temperature varies from 70 to 80 degrees.

When the fermentation takes place, a brifk intoffine motion is observable in the liquor; it becomes turbid, some faculæ subside, while a frothy four arifes to the furface. A hifting noife is observed, and a quantity of gas is difcharged, which has been proved to be fixed air. The liquor acquires a vinous finell and tafte; and, from being heavier, becomes specifically lighter than water. During the progress of the process, the temperature of the liquor is higher than that of the furrounding atmosphere, with which it is neceffary that a communication be preferved. After fome days, these appearances begin to decline. If the process be rightly conducted, and flopped at a proper period, a liquor, capable of vielding vinous or ardent spirit, is the result. If the procefs has been too flow, and the degree of heat infufficient, the liquor will be flat and fpiritlefs; but if thefe have been too rapid and exceflive, it will pais into the acctous fermentation, to which indeed it is continually tending. But the more ardent fpirit is generated, the lefs fpeedy will be the change to the acetous flate.

During the progrefs of the acetous fermentation, which will even proceed in cloicly flopped veffels, no feparation of air is obfervable, nor any itriking phenomena. The liquor gradually lofes its vinous tafte, and becomes four, and a grofs fediment falls to the bottom; while a quantity of vifeid matter full remains, enveloping the acid, which may be feparated from much of the impurity by diffillation.

The progrefs of thefe proceffes is accelerated by the addition of ferments, to the action of which it has been supposed necessary, that they should have passed through the flate of fermentation into which they are intended to bring the liquor to which they are added; and that it was not possible to bring the farinaceous infusions into the vinous fermentation without the aid of matter already in that state. This the preceding experiments have proved to be an ill-founded notion, as it appears that fixed air, obtained from calcareous earth by means of acids, produces the effect, as perfectly as when the ferment has been taken from a formenting liquor.

In fermentation, it is faid, new arrangements take place in the particles of the liquor, and the properties of the fubfiance become different from what it before poffeffed. But what these arrangements are, or how these properties are changed, we are not told. Dr. Black, 1 am informed, declares he is anacquainted with any fatisfactory theory.

But perhaps facts, effecially fome late enemical differences, may throw light on the matter, and enable us to advance fome conjectures that may tend, at leaft, to lay the foundation of a theory.

1. Sugar is an effential falt, containing much oily, vifcid matter. During its combuilton it repeatedly explodes; a proof that it contains not only much inflammable matter, but alfo a quantity of air. Malt is faccharine, united to much vifeld mucilaginous matter.

2. If nitrous acid be added to fugar, the inflammable principle of the latter is feized by the acid; the whole, or at leaft one of the conflituent parts of which, is thereby converted into nitrous gas, and flies off in that form. By repeated affufions of this acid, more gas is formed, and the remainder of the fugar is changed into cryftals, having the properties of an acid, fai generis, and which has been denominated, by Bergman, faccharine acid*.

3. Saccharine acid is refolvable by heat into fome phlegm, a large quantity of inflammable and fixed air (both of which contain latent heat) and into a brownifh refiduum, amounting to  $\frac{1}{10}$  of the weight of the acid. Fixed air is fuppofed to confift of pure air united to phlogifton; and inflammable air, to be almost pure phlogiston.

4. Water is found to be formed by the union of pure air, and inflammable gas, deprived of their latent heat; for, if these two elastic fluids be exploded together, in a clofe veffel, over mercury, the whole is converted into water of the fame weight as that of the air and gas jointly. In the process much heat is evolved. Again, if water, in the form of steam, be forced to pass through a tube, containing iron fhavings, ftrongly heated, the water, according to Meffrs. Watt and Lavoifier, is decompofed; the phlogilton passes off, united with heat, in the form of inflammable gas. while the humor, or dephlogifticated water, unites to the calx of the metal, from which it may be again obtained, in the form of pure air, or of äerial acid, according to the degree in which the calx has been dephlogifticated. It has been already observed, that faccharine matter cannot be brought to ferment without water.

5. A vinous liquor, on distillation, yields an ardent fpirit.

6. Spirit of wine has had the whole of its inflammable part diffipated by combustion ; after which, Mr. Lavoifier found the watery part increased in weight, from fixteen to eighteen ounces, by the abforption of the air, decomposed by the combuffion.

7. The refiduum, after the diftillation of ardent fpirit from fermented liquors, is acid.

8. Mr. Lavoisier has fupposed pure air to be the acidifying principle of all the acids; and that their difference from each other confifts in the bafis united to this pure air.

As our experiments were made with an infusion of malt, and with fixed air, employed as a ferment, let us endeavour to account for the feveral phenomena and refults of fermentation, as appearing in these experiments.

The wort being impregnated with fixed air, and placed in fuch a fituation as to bring it to the degree of heat, at which wort is commonly mixed with yeaft, the gas for fome time remains in a latent or quiefcent state; but, from its tendency to recover its elastic form, aided by heat, it prefently begins to burft from the bonds in which it was confined. By this effort the mucilaginous parts of the infusion are attenuated; the faccharine matter is developed; and, the fame caufe continuing to act, the coaffituent parts of the matter are feparated, and the particles of the component principles being by this means placed beyond the fphere of their mutual attraction, begin to repel each other. A large quantity of phlogiston is difcharged, together with fome pure air. The greateft part of the inflammable principle enters into a new combination, joining the phlogistic part of the water, and, in proportion, feparating from it the pure air, while another, but much fmaller portion, uniting in its nafcent flate with this pure air, forms fixed air; which, in its attempt to escape, carries up with it much of its viscid confinement. In the conversion of the pure into fixed air, a confiderable portion of heat is rendered sensible. And this heat contributes to the farther decomposition of the faccharine fubstance. The viscid matter collecting on the furface, prevents the efcape of too much of the gas, and promotes its re-abformion, that thereby the brifk and agreeable tafte of the liquor may be formed; while the inflammable principle, accumulating and becoming condenfed in it, forms the ardent fpirit.

Thus a decomposition of the water takes place, fomewhat fimilar to what Mr. Watt has fuppofed in the production of pure air from nitre. The nitrous acid, feizing on the phlogitton of the water, dephlogiflicates the humor or other part of the water, which, combining with the matter of heat, paffes off in the form of pure air.

The veffel being stopped, fome of the faccharine matter being not decomposed, the liquor will continue to have a fweetish tatte. But, the fermentation still going on, in a more a more gradual manuer, the liquor will become lefs fiveet, and, proportionably, more imprognated with ardent fpirit; and the faculæ fubfiding in the form of lees, it will be now fully fermented, mellow, and pellucid *.

But if the faceharine matter be too much diluted, or the veffel be placed in a warm fituation, the liquor will then pafs from the vinous to the acctous fermentation.

In the formation of the facchatine acid, by means of nitrous acid, the last is fuppoied, by carrying off the phlogiston of the fugar, to develope the faccharine acid. Or, according to Mr. Lavoifier's hypothefi, one of the conflituent parts of the nitrous acid performs this office, while the other, or pure air, uniting to the peculiar bafis, contained in the fugar, forms faccharine acid.

So in the acctous fermentation, if it happen that the phlogifton is not in fufficient quantity, or the force with which it is combined in the liquor be weakened, by a long application of heat or other caules, it will begin to feparate from the other confitment parts of the liquor. The ardent fpirit, thus decomposed, difappears gradually, the humor or dephlogifticated water, or, in other words, the bails of pure air, predominates; and this, combining with the faccharine bafis, but ftill retaining fome portion of phlogitlon, forms the acetous acid.

Thus the acetous fermentation acts in a manner, in fome refpects, analogous to the action of nitrous acid on fugar. In the latter cafe, the phlogiston is separated more rapidly; and the acid, refulting from the procefs, is that called faccharine acid. In the former, the changes are more flowly produced; the phlogifton flies of inore gradually; and from a different modification, in confequence of these varieties, the product is not faccharine acid, but vinegar. And perhaps it may ferve to give fome appearance of probability to the above theory, to recolleft, that the refiduum of fermented liquors, after the feparation of the ardent spirit, which appears to be water fuperfaturated with phlogifton, is acid.

I have avoided carrying these reflections to the phenomena which appear in the putrid fermentation, as not fo immediately connected with faccharine fubstances; and from a conviction that I have already engroffed too much of the fociety's time.-If I have contributed any thing to their entertainment, or that may tend to enlarge the bounds of fcience, I fhail efteem myfelf happy; and, more fo, if what has been advanced may prove uleful and advantageous to my fellow-creatures .--- Senfible that one fuch fast is of more real worth than the most ingenious and well-wrought hypothefis.

* In the fermentation of wine, a fubfiance is deposited at the fides and bottom of the cafk, called farter; which is lately different to confift of pure vegetable alkali, united to a fuperabundant quantity of a peculiar acid. But as this is not produced by malt liquors, it has not been noticed in the effay.

A System of Kentish Agriculture, transmitted by the Rev. Mr. Hill, of East Malling, near Maidstone, Kent; being his anfwers to the queries proposed to him by the Bath Agriculture Society. Extracted from vol. iii. of their Letters and Papers.

Gentlemen.

TN reply to the queries fent to me by your fectedary by your fecretary, I fend you the following answers. Permit me to repeat my best wishes for the prosperity of your fociety, and the fuccefs of their very laudable endeavours to promote the advancement of agriculture; and to affure you that I am, with great fincerity,

Your most obedient fervant, DANIEL HILL,

East-Malling, July 16, 1785.

Query 1st. What are the kinds of foil from which you generally obtain the best crops of wheat, barley, peafe, oats, beans, vetches, turnips, carrots, and cabbages; and what are the ufual quantities of feed fown, and the average produce per flatute acre, Wincheiter meafure ?

Answer. Our beit crops are generally obtained from hazel loams; and if they are fomewhat fliff and inclining to clav, the better. On fuch lands, the use of heavy large harrows and rollers in the fpring, to break and pulverize the foil, cannot be too much recommended.

On fuch lands fo pulverized, we frequently get of wheat from four to five quarters, beans from five to feven quarters, barley and oats fix, and often feven quarters per acre.

The quantity of feed generally fown per acre, is, of beans, peafe, wheat *, and barley, three builtels; of oats, from four to five buthels.

2. 2d. What is the usual courfo of crops adopted by your beft farmers on the different foils ?

A. Our beit lands never lie fallow; and the order of our crops is,

1. Wheat.

2. Barley or oats.

3. Peafe or beans ;- the latter always in rows, hand-hoed twice with a two-inch hoe near and between the beans; horfe-hoed twice, and laftly earthed with a horie-hoe. After the beans are off, we plough fhallow with a broad thare, and harrow up, and burn the weeds if any remain, thus preparing a good tilth for wheat.

On our ordinary, fandy, or itone fhattery [ftone brash] land, our courie of crops is different.

1. Wheat.

After that (before Michaelmas) fow winter vetches or rve, and eat them off with fheep and bullocks in the fpring.

Then plough for turnips three or four times, each time harrowing of and burning the weeds; then lay on forty cart-loads of dung per acre. We always carefully hand-hoe the turnips, as the charge is amply repaid by the crop. Sometimes, in a kindly feafon, we get a good crop of turnips after early peafe.

Oats and barley will produce (efpecially oats) from five to feven quarters per acre, after a good turnip feafon, and the crop well fed off with fheep, especially if good hay and oil-cake be given them at the fame time.

With barley and oats we fow clover; next year wheat, and laftly turnips.

2. 3d. What manure now generally in use do you find most ferviceable, on the following foils respectively, viz. stiff clays, light fand, gravelly, moory, cold and wet, or what is called stone brash land?—In what quantities are the feveral manures laid on per acre; at what feason; and how long will each last without renewal?

A. On fliff clays or fand, or gravelly cold wet land, lay marle or chalk early in the winter, at the rate of eighty cart-loads per acre, which will laft twenty years; befide this, dung and lime is fometimes added.

2. 4th. Have you different any new manure more efficacious than those generally used, and which may easily be obtained in large quantities? If fo, what is it, when and how applied?

A. Dung made by fat bullocks fed on hay and oil-cakes, and of fheep fed on the fame on turnip lands. Large oxen will eat twenty pounds of oil-cake per day, but Welch heifers will thrive well with half the quantity.

2. 5tb. What is the beft topdreining for cold wet paftures which cannot eafly be drained ?

A. Wood-afhes, coal-afhes, with fowls or pigeons dung fpread thin.

2. 6th. What materials do you find beit and most lasting for covered drains or land ditches?

A. Ragged flones or brickbats, or rather flat flones, two fet on edge eight or ten inches afunder, and a third over; and where thefe cannot be had, black-thorn or other bufhes. Some perfous ufe turf with the grafs fide downwards, leaving a hollow below for the water.

2.7tb. What are the kinds of wood which you have found from experience to thrive beft on bleak barren foils, cold fwampy bogs, and black moory ground?

A. Scotch firs on bleak barren foils, efpecially in a northern afpect. On cold fwampy bogs, the Dutch willow will do great things; but afh will fucceed better, and is far more uleful and profitable.

2. 8tb. What are your methods of raising lucern, faintfoin, and burnet; on what lands do you find them to answer best; and what the average produce?

A. Lucern fucceds beft in drills one foot afunder *, and kept clean by a fmall plough drawn by one horfe. Saintfoin flourifhes moft on chalky, and dry flone fhattery land, on which it will produce two tons per acre on an average, for fourteen or fifteen years. Burnet is in difgrace with us, and generally laid afide as ufelefs.

2. 9th. How is your turnip hufbandry conducted; and what is the beft method of preventing or flopping the ravages of the fly on the young plants? A. The first part of this query is a light roller over them with a bundle of black-thorn failened behind it.

2. 10th. Do you prefer the drill to the broad-caft method of fowing grain; in what inftances, and on what foils?

A. When lands are foul and weedy, the drill is certainly preferable to the broad-caft; as by that means, the horfe-hoe may be ufed.

2. 11th. What is the comparative advantage of using oxen inflead of horfes in hufbandry?

A. Where a farm confils of arable land and good patture, the use of oxen is deemed preferable to that of horses, where men can be procured to drive them.

2. 12th. Omitted.

2. 13*tb*. What new improvements have you made, or adopted in implements of hufbandry?

A. Our improvements in implements of hufbandry have of late years been great and various, particularly in drill ploughs, which by dropping the feed regularly, and depofiting it at a proper depth, fave a great deal of grain. Of carts we have a great variety, fome for dung made firong with two wheels for two horfes, and three wheels for one horfe; and others of lighter kinds.

I fubmitted your queries to a very fkilful farmer, from whom I received the following anfwers for land of a middling kind:

To the first query.—We have most wheat, beans, and vetches, if in proper tilth, from stiff land. The most barley, peafe, and eats, from a lighter foil. Wheat on an average twenty-eight bushels per acre. We fow three bushels.

One fack of barley fown per acre produces five quarters after turning. Five buthels of peale per acre, produce from three to four quarters.— Four buthels of beans, and five buthels of oats per acre, produce from five to fix quarters.

Vetches, &c. fed off, make a good wheat feafon.

ad query.—A clean fallow, and fowed with clover; after clover, wheat or beans the enfuing fpring on one earth. Turnips on four ploughings and dunged; hand-hoeing twice. Then barley and clover; next wheat.

3d query. Our best manure is dung from beasts fatted with oilcakes, and fit for all foils. We lay on fixty cart-loads per acre, (each cart holding thirty bushels of coa') which for turnips or wheat, will last fix years.

5th query.-Wood-afhes are the beft, and will kill rofues.

6tb query.—Green alder poles, fuch as we use for hops, fixteen or eighteen feet long, two at the bottom and one at top; or green blackthorn covered with heath, or loofo fromes will do.

7th and 8th queries.—The fame answer as from Mr. Hill.

10th guery.-Same anfwer as from Mr. Hill.

12th query.--Kill your theep as foon as the rot appears.

Gentlemen,

Gentlemen,

It may be proper to remark, that the field on which the above experiment was made, was an oat ftubble in the autumn of 1783. In October it was ploughed, and left in a rough flate during the winter. In April it was crofs-ploughed and harrowed.

On the 8th of May I began planting, by marking out the field into beds or ridges eight feet wide, leaving a space of two feet wide for an alley between every two ridges. The manure (a compost of stable dung, virgin earth, and fcrapings of a turnpike road) was then brought on the land, and deposited in fmall heaps on the centre of each ridge, in the proportion of about thirty cart-loads to each acre. Α trench was then opened with a fpade, breadth way of the ridge, about four inches deep; in this trench the potatoe fets were placed, at the diftance of nine inches from each other; the dung was then fpread in a trench on the fets, and a space or plit of fourteen inches in breadth, dug in upon them.

When the plants were about fix inches high, they were carefully hoed, and foon after the two-feet intervals between the ridges were dug, and the contents thrown around the young plants. This refreshment, added to the ample manuring previoully beftowed, produced fuch a luxuriance and rapidity of growth, that no weed could fhew its head. I need not add, that the land is now in a state of the highest fertility, perfectly clean, and in most excellent preparation either for wheat or fpring corn.

It may be also remarked, that in this mode of planting, a very fmall space of ground is left unoccupied, and the crop more abundant, than any I ever before experiencea.

If this experiment be thought worthy of imitation, and the culture of this excellent root be thereby in any degree extended, it will afford great fatisfaction to the fociety's well-wisher,

And most obedient servant,

J. BILLINGSLEY. Albuvick-Grove, Nov. 5, 1784.

P.S. I did not think it necessary to fend particulars of my whole potatoe crop, as it would be in a great measure a recapitulation of the foregoing account.

An Account of the origin, progress, and regulations, with a defcription of the newly-chablished Bridewell, or Penitentiary Houje, at Wymondham, in Norfolk. By Sir Thomas Beever, Bart. addreffed to the Secretary of the Bath Society; extracted from the Jame work.

Sir,

NE avocation in which I have 🥒 lately been engaged, I will relate to you. Having read Mr. Howard's book defcribing the flate and condition of our prifons, it unturally led my thoughts to that fubject. The idea that as many prifoners died yearly in England by the gaol distemper, as by all the executions put together; and the accounts of the diffoluteness and profligacy, which by the intermixture of them were learnt and practifed in those places of confinement; determined me to attempt, at least, a reformation of those crying evils in this county.

Happily my wishes met the ideas of the other gentlemen acting in the committion of the peace here; and to their great honour, by their unanimous concurrence and affiltance. I have been able to get erected a new bridewell and penitentiary house at Wymondham, built upon fuch a plan as enables the governor to keep the fexes and degrees of offenders encirely leparate from each other, and under such regulations and difcipline, as promife (with God's bletting) to work a therough reformation in their manners, whereby they may, and many probably will, again become ufeful members of fociety. The houfe is conftructed agreeable to the directions of the late act of parliament, and fo contrived, that there are feparate cells for each prifoner, airy, neat, and healthy, in which they fleep, and, when neceffary, work the whole day alone. This folitude is found to affect the most unfeeling and hardened among them, beyond fetters or firipes; and is that part of their punifhment from which reformation is chiefly expected. Their cells are all arched, fo that no fire can reach beyond the cell in which it begins. The rules and orders for the government of the house were, at the defire of the juffices at their quarter feffions, drawn up from, and according to, the directions of the faid act, by myfelf, and have met with their approbation.

Lord Loughborough, who came this circuic at our lait affizes, exprefied himfelf fo well pleafed with the plan and regulations, that he told me he would fend thither every convict fentenced to confidement, and accordingly tent fix from the affizes. As this attention to the lives and morals of thofe unhappy members of fociety flould be extended, I will by the first or portunity (if you defire it) fend you a copy of the rules and orders of the houle, together with the returns conflantly made by the governor to each quarter feflions, by which you will fee effected, what Mr. Howard defpaired of, viz. " that the pri-" foners' carnings in the houfe " have uniformly exceeded the fum " expended for their maintenance." I wifh and hope this example may excite a like attention in other counties.

LETTER II.

Hethel, Jan. 20, 1785. Sir,

I herewith transmit you a copy of the rules, orders, and regulations, to be observed and enforced at the house of correction at Wymondham; and which are also now extended to the other houses of correction in this county. If they appear severe, let it be understood they are the feverities of the legiflature, not of the compiler. The firit feven rules are inferted verbatim from the fchedule to the act of the 22d of his prefent majefty .----The reft are either included in the body of the fame act, or required by the act of the 19th, called The Penitentiary AE. But I will make no apology for them, nor can 1 with any propriety deem them too harih, fince they have met with the entire approbation of the gentlemen of this county, as well as that of the judges of the affize, who have perufed them.

Pritons furchy fhould be places of real punishment, and even carry terror terror in their name. I am certain they ought not to afford either indulgencies or amuiements to the perfons configned to them. However I must observe, that perions committee for iniall offences, or on light fuspicion, are under lefs reftraint. They are allowed to work in fome fort of fociety, two, three, or four together; and if the house be full, they fometimes lodge two in a cell, and are never fettered. All the prifoners, when fick, are attended by a furgeon or apothecary, with as much affiduity and tendernefs as the greatest humanity can require.

I have fent you likewife a table of the prifoners' fare or diet in the houfe, by which you will fee, that although not pampered, they are wholefomely fed. Experience justifies me in faying this; for, except fuch as were difeafed when they entered the houfe, I have not known one prifoner who has been fick in it for these twelve months past. Included is also the form of a return made by the keeper of the house, to every quarter feffions of the peace, whereby the flate of the prifon is confiantly known to the juftices, and all abufes obviated or fpeedily remedied.

I am, &c.

LETTER III.

Description of the Prijon.

Hethel, Feb. 12, 1786. Sir,

In compliance with your requeft, I now transmit to you a description of the prifon which has been crected at Wymondham, in this county; the faccefs of which having fo much exceeded the expectations, and fo fully answered the wisses of the gentlemen here, as to encourage them to alter, and make additions to all the other bridewells within their jurifdiction, and to put each of them under the fame regulations.

The new buildings of the Wymondham Bridewell, added to the former old house (which is now appropriated to the use of the governor) confift of two wings, which are attached to the old house, and joined by a building in front, containing a large room, in which is placed a mill for cutting logwood, or any other wood for the use of dyers, and beating hemp; together with a flable, and flore-rooms for lodging the materials used by the prifoners in their work. The whole of thefe buildings form a quadrangle, inclosing an area or yard, of about eighty feet by feventy feet; in which fome of the prifoners are allowed occafionally to take the air. In the two wings only (to both which there is a palfage from the governor's houle) are the offenders confined; and in each of them there are on the groundfloor feven feparate rooms, or cells, for the new prifoners, of fourteen feet eight inches by feven feet four inches, with a work-room of twenty feet fix inches by ten feet.

On the floor above, which is chiefly used for the women and lefs dangerous prifoners, are, in each wing, four feparate rooms or cells, of the fame dimensions with those below; with a work-room to each wing, the fame as on the groundfloor; together with an infirmary of ten feet fix inches by fourteen feet eight inches, and a fcullery, clofet, and neceffary to each. The cell's, both above and below, are all arched, to prevent the pofibility of fire, or any probable communication of infectious diforders. They are all ten feet high ; and the windows of these rooms looking into the quadrangle, and being grated infide and outfide with iron, and feven feet high from the floor of the rooms, afford the prifoners no poffibility of looking out, or having the leaft intercourse with any other perion.

The cells are airy, having rerion. only wooden fhutters to the windows; and by a flip or wicket in the doors, a thorough air is admitted, whereby they are always free from any ill fcent. This is however with an exception to over cell on the upper floor in each wing, and to the infirmaries; for the windows of thefe are glazed, and have cafements to open occasionally; being mostly kept for the ufe of women having infant children with them, and for the weak and convalescent prisoners. But as the confiruction of this building would little answer the purpole of its erection, without a correspondent management and conduct in the interior government of it, good care has been taken to enforce the rules, orders, and regulations established; and returns are regularly made by the governor to the juffices at every quarter feffions.

The manufactory established here at prefent, is that of cutting logwood for the dyers at Norwich, and beating, heckling, and fpinning hemp. In the labour of heckling, a tolerable workman will earn from eight fhillings to ten fullings per week. The women and girls fpin it by a wheel fo contrived as to draw a thread with each hand; by which means, two of them can earn at leaft equal wages with three women fpinning with one hand only. If the building flould be enlarged, and the number of prifoners in creafe, fome of them will then be inflructed in the art of weaving the yarn made in the house. At prefent, both the tow and the varn is fold to the different houfes of induitry effablified in this county, and at Norwich. In the last return of the governor to the quarter fellions, we had the fatisfaction to find, that the mouey arifing from the earnings of the prifoners, was one pound eight fhillings and ten-pence more than double the fum expended for their maintenance.

This, though it cannot be deemed more than a fecondary confideration, is furely no triffing one to derive a grofit from the labour of fuch pertons as were herecofore loft to, or become a burden upon the public; and it throngly marks the impolicy of fending thefe unhappy objects out of the kingdom. This fum indeed was further increased about five guineas, by adding to it the profit from the trade account; but as to have this become the general refult, muit depend greatly, perhaps chiefly, upon the choice of the governor, and fomewhat on the activity of the magistrates, too much care cannot be taken in the first, especially as it will be the probable means of exciting the latter. We have been fo fortunate as to meet with a governor who relieves us from a great part of our attention to, and direction of him.

The filence and peaceable demeanour, the cleanlinefs and induftry, of those unhappy perfons who are the inhabitants of this house, are really admirable; and fuch as greatly encourages the pleafing exrectation, that their punithment will have that effect upon their future lives and conduct, which every humane benevolent mind muff fincerely with for. And they leave me without a doubt, that bridewells, with proper attention paid to them, may in future be made feminaries of induffer and reformation, inftead of receptacles of idlenefs and corruption. To effect thefe purpofes, it will be neceffary to provide the priloners prifoners with fuitable and conftant work. This in moft counties will neceffarily vary, but may be eafily obtained, efpecially if, by an allowance to the governor out of their earnings, it be made his intercft as well as his duty to look carefully to the performance of it. The allowance given at this houfe, is threepence in every fhilling of the nett earnings, and this is confidered as a part of his falary.

I must not omit to inform you, that in this folitary confinement, and thus employed, it has not yet been found neceffary to punish any of the prifoners with irons; and that, fince the new erection and regulation of this prifon, the magistrates in the vicinity; as well as the keeper of it, have obferved, that in no one equal period of time has there been fo few commitments to it.

This preventive justice, fo preferable to punitive justice, molt fully evinces the propriety and humanity of the undertaking, and must naturally excite a hope, that fimilar plans will be adopted in every county. This indeed I am ftrongly induced to believe will foon be the cafe, as I have already received letters from different gentlemen in Glocestershire, Oxfordshire, Wilts, Hertfordshire, Hampshire, York-shire, Lancashire, Sussolk, Wales, and Scotland, requesting the plan, rules, orders, table of diet, and returns; informing me, that in their respective counties they had determined upon building, and putting their houses of correction under fimilar regulations. The gentlemen of the city of Norwich have alfo fent a deputation of their magistrates to view the prison; upon whofe report, they mean inftantly to enter upon a reformation of their own prisons.

If in this letter I may appear to have been either prolix, or frivolous, but fhould notwithit and ing have been able to convey any ufeful hints to the public, I fhall be fatisfied in having lacrificed the reputation of ability at the fhrine of duty, and with pleafure fubficibe myfelf, &c. THOMAS BEEVOR.

[N. B. In another letter, dated Feb. 18th, Sir Thomas Beevor has added the following remarks :---

" In proof of the cleanlinefs, and healthinefs of this prifon, no perfon who entered it in health has hitherto fallen fick in it. I have never had any complaint against any one for immorality or prophanenefs. The effect of the folitarinefs and mechanical regularity of the place is such, as to render them fo contrite and fubdued, that it not only promifes fair for a lasting reformation in these poor unfortunate wretches, but, what is a fill better and more pleasing confideration. that it may prove a preventive of crimes in others. For, from an examination of the commitments to this house, before and fince the prefent regulation took place, it appears, that one-third fewer have been confined in it fince the latter period; and it is fomewhat remark. able, that, except in one inflance, no prifoner has been a fecond time committed to it."]

On the upe of steeping Seed-Barley in a dry feafon. By Mr. James Chapple; addroffed to the Secretary of the Eath Seciety. From the fame work, Sir, NY great fuccels in making the following experiment, occafions my communicating an account of of it to you, for the benefit of the public, if thought worthy a place in the third volume of the Bath Society's experimental papers.

The last spring being remarkably dry, I foaked my feed-barley in the black water taken from a refervoir which conflantly receives the draining of my dung heap and stables. As the light corn floated on the top I skimmed it off, and let the reil fland twenty-four hours. On taking it from the water, I mixed the feed grain with a fufficient quantity of fifted wood affies to make it fpread regularly, and fowed three fields with it. I began fowing the 16th, and finished the 23d of April. The produce was fixty buffiels per acre, of good clean barley, without any fmall or green corn, or weeds at harveft. No perfon in this country had better grain.

I fowed also several other fields with the same feed dry, and without any preparation; but the crop, like those of my neighbours, was very poor; not more than twenty bushels per acre, and much mixed with green corn and weeds when harvested. I also fowed some of the feed dry on one ridge in each of my former fields, but the produce was very peor in comparison of the other parts of the field.

IN the year 1774, the fociety received from one of their corresponding members in Jamaica a cask of red earth, a proper quantity of which was sent to several architects, for trial.

The gentleman from whom it came thought it a kind of Puzzolana, and defcribed his method of uling it as follows : " To one meafure of the red earth, add two of the fame meafure of well flackt lime. and one of fand, and then let them be well mixed and wrought like common mortar, with fair water; and fo made up in a hear, but in about eight hours it will begin to acquire a hardness, and the heap must be cut down, and well wet with water, and finartly worked and mixed over again, and fo fmartly worked and wet morning and evening, for a whole week, before it is fit for use; and after it is laid on, it must be strictly attended while it dries and hardens, to clofe any crack that may appear in the drying, for about forty-eight hours, and then it is generally out of danger.

But if any cracks, &c. fhould appear after it is quite dry, as fuppofe the covering of a building, eiftern. &c. a labourer, with a little fand or brick-duft, and a little common white-wafh, thrown over the crack and fmartly rubbed in with a brickbat, or fandy fione, the crack will foon difappear, and the work will be as good as ever.

By means of this composition, a mortar may be made (far exceeding any other) wherewith to lay the foundation, and raife the fuperflucture of any dam, bridge, or guttering; and in fhort, any kind of building where water, or any kind of liquid, is to be concerned, because the fost new-made mortar will harden, and foon become like a flone totally immerfed in water.

Of this composition may be made the best coverings for all manner of buildings, witnels my own house, that has been covered with this composition (though not at that time brought to its present perfection) these twenty years, and is not a pin the worfe.

In regard to matters of pleafure, terrace-walks, canals, flowerpots, urns, obelifks, ftatues, and even colloffal flatues, and other ornaments for gardens, may be made of or with this composition, as it relifts rain, and every fort of moilture, and nothing but violence will make the least impression, so that the five orders of architesture, with their various ornaments, may be most elegantly expressed on the outfide or infide of buildings, in the plaisterers way, and last for ages, if no violence is used to them.

In covering a building, I would choofe to lay it on fix inches thick, upon a flat ftrong-framed well-lathed roof, as it will fhrink in drying, and is the beit and cheapeft cover-I know of, as I have experienced ever fince 1747." The following are two letters from Mr. Mylue, addreffed to the fecretary of the above-mentioned fociety, relative to his experiments on the Red Earth.

Sir,

"GOING from Cous towards Affouan, we leave the town of Nequada on the right. The Mahometans have feveral mofques, and a Coptic bifhop refides there. The ifland of Matara is very near it, and two leagues further we difcover the ruins of Thebes, the magnificence of which poets and hiftorians have alike been eager to defcribe. Citations from the ancients, who faw this city, will give you, Sir, an idea of what it formerly was; and an exact account of the monuments fill in being, will enable you to judge what degree of credit those recitals deferve. The dotted line in the map, passing by Carnac, Luxor, Medinet-Abou, and Gournou, will indicate what the extent was of this once famous city.

lifth. The temple fill is flanding, but it was flripped of its filver, gold, ivory, and precious flones, when Cambyfes fet fire to all the temples of Egypt."

I have only quoted the principal facts which that hiftorian writes concerning the flourifhing flate of Thebes, they being fufficient to convey an idea of its beauty; what I fhall eite from Strabo will give a picture of its decline, fuch as it was eighteen centuries ago.

" Thebes, or Diofpolis, prefents only remains of its former grandeur, difperfed over a space eighty stadia in length. Here are found a great number of temples, in part destroyed by Cambyfes : its inhabitants have retired to fmall towns, eaft of the Nile, where the prefent city is built; and to the western shore, near Memnonium *, at which place we admire two coloflal ftone figures, flanding on each fide; the one entire, the other in part thrown down, it has been faid, by an earthquake +. There is a popular opinion, that the remaining part of this statue, to-wards the base, utters a sound once Curiofity leading me to a day. examine the fact, I went thither with Ælius Gallus, who was accompanied by his numerous friends, and an efcort of foldiers. I heard a found, about fix o'clock in the morning, but dare not affirm whether it proceeded from the bafe, from the coloffus, or had been produced by fome perfon prefent; for one is rather inclined to suppose a thousand different causes, than that it should be the effect of a certain affemblage of flones. Beyond Memnonium are the tombs of the kings, hewn out of the rock. There are about forty, made after a marvellous manner, and worthy the attention of travellers; near them are obelisks, bearing various inferiptions, deferiptive of the wealth, power, and extensive empire of those fovereigns, who reigned over Scythia, Bactriana, India, and what They alfo is now called Ionia. recount the various tributes those kings had exacted, and the number of their troops, which amounted to a million of men."

Before I tell you, Sir, how many of the monuments deferibed by thefe hiftorians ftill exift, it is neceffary to inform you of the diffribution of the ornaments, veflibules, courts, and edifices of the Egyptian temples, left we fhould lofe ourfelves amidft their ruins.

" In front of each of the temples of Egypt is a paved avenue, a hundred feet wide, and three or four hundred in length. Two rows of fphinxes, twenty cubits or more diftant from each other, adorned the fides of these avenues, at the end of which porticos were built, but not in any fixed number. These porticos lead to a magnificent open fpace, which fronts the temple. Beyond is the fanctuary, which is fmaller, and in which no human figures are ever fculptured, and very feldom those of animals .---Walls, of an equal height with the temple, form the fides of this open fpace. Having nothing to confult but monuments mutilated by men or by time, I hope the above defcription will fupply the imperfection of mine. Thus guided, let us advance to the fouth of Carnac, where we find the remains of one of the four principal temples mentioned by Diodorus Siculus. Here are eight entrances, three of which have each a fphinx of enormous fize flauding in front ; with two coloffal statues, on each fide the fphinx, which are each cut from a fingle block of marble, in the antique Croffing these majestic avetaste. nues, we come to four porticos, each thirty feet wide, fifty-two in height, and one hundred and fifty The entrance to thefe in length. is through pyramidal gates, and the ceiling is formed of ftones of an aftonishing fize, supported by the two walls.

The first of these porticos is entirely of red granite, perfectly po-Without are four rows of lished. hieroglyphics, within only three. On each of the latter, I remarked two human figures, larger than life, and fculptured with great art. Coloffal figures, rifing fifteen feet above the bottom of the door, decorate its fides; without are two statues, thirty-three feet high, the one of red granite, the other fpotted with black and grey; and within is another, of a fingle block of marble, wanting the head, each bearing a kind of crofs in its hand, that is to fay, a phallus, which, among the Egyptians, was the fymbol of fertility.

The fecond portico is half deftroyed; the gate has only two rows of hieroglyphics, of gigantic fize, one towards the fouth, the other towards the north. Each front of the third portico is covered with hieroglyphics of colosial figures, and at the entrance of the gate are the remains of a flatue of white marble, the trunk of which is fifteen feet in circumference, and wearing a helmet, round which a ferpent is twined. The fourth portico is little more than walls, almost entirely destroyed, and heaps of rubbish, among which are parts of a coloffus, of red granite, the body of which is thirty feet round.

extent, equals the majefty of the building. It is likewife embellished by a double colonnade; each column is above fifty feet high, and eighteen in circumference at the base. Their capitals are in the form of a vafe, over which a fquare stone is laid, which probably ferved as a pedeftal for statues. 'Two prodigious colosfal figures, mutilated by violence, terminate these colonnades. Standing at this place, the affonished eve furveys the temple, the height of which is most furprifing, in all its immenfity. Its walls of marble appear everlaiting. Its roof, which rifes in the centre, is fuffained by eighteen rows of columns. Those standing under the most lofty part are thirty feet in circumference, and eighty in height; the others are one third lefs. The world does not contain a building the character and grandeur of which more forcibly imprefs awe and majefty: it feems adequate to the high idea the Egyptians had formed of the Supreme Being; nor can it be entered or beheld but with reverence. Its fides, both within and without, are loaded with hieroglyphics, and extraordinary figures. On the northern wall are reprefentations of battles, with horfes and chariots, one of which is drawn by On the fouthern are two itags. barks, with canopies, at the end of which the fun appears; the mariners guide them with poles; two men, feated at the flern, feem to direct their proceedings, and re-

Each of these superb monuments is formed from a fingle block of red granite, and does honour to the genius and fcience of the antient Egyptians. There are hieroglyphics, in various divisions, engraved on these obelifks, three of which remain ftanding, and the other is thrown down.

Proceeding caftward from the great temple, after croffing heaps of rubbifh, we come to a building called by Strabo the fanctuary, which is fmall. The gate is ornamented with columns, three of which are grouped and united under one fole capital. Within are various apartments of granite. of the temple, Sir, which are in best prefervation. Within its vast limits are feveral edifices, almost destroyed, which, no doubt, appertained to the priefts and facred animals. Near the ruins is a large expanse of water; and we meet at every flep with remains of columns, fphinxes, statues, colossal figures, and ruins, fo magnificent that the imagination is kept in continual admiration and amazement. Were the ground occupied by the various entrances, porticos, and courts, appertaining to the temple measured, we should find the whole was at least half a league in circumference ; and that Diodorus Siculus was not deceived when he allowed it that extent.

The plain lying between Carnac and Luxor is not lefs than a league in length, and was once covered with the houfes of the Egyptians, who lived in that eastern part of Though, according to Thebes. Diodorus Siculus*, they were five ftories high, and folidly built, they have not been able to refift the ravages of time and conquerors, but are totally deftroyed +. The ground is at prefent much raifed by the annual floodings of the river, which has covered it with feveral feet of mud, and the ruins are below the furface. Corn, flax, and vegetables, grow in the very places where, three thousand years ago, public squares, palaces, and numerous edifices, were the admiration of the enlightened people who inhabited them. At the farther end of this plain is the village of Luxor, near which are the avenues and remains of another temple, still more ruinous than the first. Its extent is spacious, and so are its courts, which are entered under porticos supported by columns forty feet high, without eftimating the base, buried under the Pyramidal majeftic gates, fand. abounding in hieroglypics; the remains of walls built with flags of granite, and which the barbarity of men only could overturn ; rows of coloffal marble figures, forty feet high, one third buried in the ground; all declare what the magnificence of the principal edifice, the feite of which is known by a hill of ruins, must have been. But nothing can give a more fublime idea of its grandeur than the two obelisks by which it was embellished, and which feem to have been placed there by giants, or the genii of fable. They are each a folid block of granite, feventy-two feet high above the furface, and thirty-two in circumference; but, being funk deep in the fand and mud, they may well be supposed ninety feet from the bafe to the fummit. Such, Sir, are the moft remarkable monuments found at prefent on the eaftern fide of Thebes. Their very afpect would awaken the genius of a polified nation, but the Turks and Copts, crufied to duft beneath an iron iceptre, behold them without aftonifhment, and build huts, which fcarcely can fereen them from the fun, in their neighbourhood. "HE villages of Gournou and Medinet-Abou, built where the weftern part of Thebes once ftood, are furrounded by grand ruins. One league weftward of the first are the grottos named Biban Elmelouk, the gates of the kings, where are feen the tombs of the ancient monarchs of the Thebais. The road to them is strewed with marbles and fragments, and we arrive at them by a winding narrow pafs, the fides of which, in various places, have been hollowed out. Large excavations have been made in the rock, which were autecedent to the building of houses and palaces. The valley widens at the farther end about two hundred fathoms, and here, at the foot of the mountain, are the paffages which lead to the tombs. Strabo counts forty of them *, Diodorus Siculus forty-feven +; but he adds, that in the time of Augustus feventeen only remained, fome of which were very much damaged. At prefent most of them are closed up, and nine of them only can be entered. The fubterranean galleries leading to them are in general ten feet high, and as many in breadth. The walls and roofs, cut in a white rock, preferve the brilliant polifh of flucco. At the far end of four principal alleys, longer and higher than the reft, is the door of a large hall, in the centre of which a marble tomb is feen, on the top of which a figure is sculptured in baffo-relievo, and another holding a sceptre in one hand on the wall; a third alfo on the ceiling, bearing a sceptre, with wings defcending as low as his heels.

The fecond grotto is fpacious and much embellished, containing on the ceiling numerous golden stars; birds painted in colours which feem to have lost nothing of their freshness and brilliancy; and hieroglyphics divided in columns, and engraved in the walls. declivity. A block of red granite fixteen teet high, ten long, and fix wide, forms the farcophagus of the king, who is fculptured in bafforelievo on the top of the tomb, and furrounded by a hieroglyphical infcription. Niches cut out of the rock probably ferved as repositories for the mummies of the royal family. The tombs erected in other apartments have been carried away by force, as their fragments atteft. There is one exceedingly fine grotto which contains only a marble lid ten feet long and fix wide; and in the farther part of the most distant cavern is a human figure in bafforelievo, with the arms croffing the breaft, and two others kneeling, one on each fide.

Thefe galleries and fubterranean apartments, which go very far under the mountains, and a very finall part only of which I have defcribed, are embellished by marble figures of men, birds, and various animals; fome fculptured in bafforelievo, others cut hollow, and fome painted in colours which are not to be effaced. Thefe unintelligible characters, which contain the hiftory of the times, conceal beneath their impenetrable veil most interefting difcoveries, and the moft remarkable facts relative to the monarchs of the Thebais, whofe power extended as far as India. Torches are neceffary in examining thefe labyrinths, into which the light of day cannot penetrate. Such, Sir, are the caverns where the bodies of kings repose, furrounded by filence and fhades. A kind of religious terror is felt while wandering through them, as if the prefence of the living disturbed the dead, in the afylums where they have retired to reft in peaceful fleep.

Returning from these dark abodes, and proceeding fouth-east, the traveller foon meets with the remains of a temple, on the fquare pillars of which are flatues that all have had their heads broken off, holding fceptre in one hand and a а whip in the other. This edifice is little more than a mountain of ruins. On the fouth fide is a pyramidal gate, which was the entrance to a portico. The extent of the courts round the temple is denoted by fragments of columns, and ftones of an incredible grandeur. In one of these courts are parts of two ftatues of black marble, which were thirty fect high; in the other, one ftands in ftupid amazement, at beholding a coloffal figure extended on the ground, and broken near the middle. The fpace between the thoulders is one and twenty feet, the head eleven feet in length and eighteen in circumference. This gigantic statue is only inferior in fize to that of Memnon. The remains of the buildings appertaining to this temple cover a mile of ground, and leave a high idea of its magnificence in the mind.

Proceeding onward about half a league, we come to the ruins of Memnonium, near Medinet-Abou, where is the largeft coloffus of Egypt, which marks the fituation of the tomb of Ofymandyas, for fo Diodorus Siculus indicates. Before I deferibe the ruins of this famous place, permit me to cite what Diodorus has written on the fubject. "Ten ftadia from the tombs of the kings of Thebes "," fays this hiftorian, * Diod. Siculus, lib. 1. The great caverns, where the tembs of the kings of H 4. Thebes

torian, " is the admirable one of Ofymandyas. The entrance to it is by a vestibule of various coloured ftones, two hundred feet long and fixty-eight high. Leaving this we enter a square peristyle, each side of which is four hundred feet in length. Animals twenty-four feet high, cut from blocks of granite, ferve as columns, and fupport the ceiling, which is composed of marble flabs twenty-feven feet fquare, and embellished throughout by golden stars, glittering on a ground of azure. Beyond this periftyle is another entrance, and after that a vestibule, built like the first, but containing more fculptures of all kinds. At the entrance are three flatues, formed from a fingle ftone by Memnon Sycnite, the principal of which, reprefenting the king, is feated, and is the largest in Egypt. One of its feet exactly measured is above feven cubits. The other two figures fupported on his knees, the one on the right, the other on the left, are those of his mother and daughter. The whole work is lefs valuable for its enormous grandeur than for the beauty of the culpture and the choice of the granite, which, tho' fo extensive, has neither flaw nor blemish on its surface. The coloffus bears this infeription, I am Ofymandyas, king of kings: be rubo would comprehend my greatness, and nubere I reft, let bim destroy fome one of these works*. Befides this is another statue of his mother, cut from a fingle block of granite thirty feet high. Three queens are sculptured on her head, intimating that she was daughter, wife, and mother of a king.

" After this portico is a perifyle ftill more beautiful than the firft, on the flones of which is engraved the hiftory of the war of Ofymandyas against the rebels of Bactriana. The façade of the front wall exhibits this prince attacking ramparts, at the foot of which the river flows; he is combating advanced troops, and by his fide is a terrible lion, ardent in his defence. On the right wall are captives in chains, with their hands and genitals cut off, as marks of reproach for their cowardice. The wall on the left contains fymbolical figures, of exceedingly good fculpture, deferiptive of the triumphs and facrifice of Ofymandyas returning from this war. In the centre of the perifyle, where the roof is open, an altar was crefted of a fingle ftone of marvellous bulk and exquisite workmanship; and at the farther wall are two colofial figures, each hewn from a fingle block of marble forty feet high, feated on their pedestals. This admirable perifyle has three gates, one between the two flatues, and the others on each fide. These lead to an edifice two hundred feet fquare, the roof of which is fup-

" Beyond is a walk furrounded by edifices of various forms, in which were tables flored with all kinds of most delicious viands. In one of these Osymandyas, cloathed in magnificent robes, offers up the gold and filver which he annually drew from the mines of Egypt to the gods. Beneath, the amount of this revenue, which was thirty-two million minas of filver, was inscribed. Another building contained the facred library, at the entrance of which thefe words were read, PHYSIC FOR THE SOUL. A fourth contained all the deities of Egypt, with the king offering fuitable prefents to each, and calling Ofiris and the furrounding divinities to witnefs he had exercifed piety toward the gods, and justice toward men. Beside the library flood one of the fineft of thefe edifices, and in it twenty couches to recline on while feasting; also the statues of Jupiter, Juno, and Ofymandyas, whole body it is fuppofed was deposited here. Various adjoining apartments contained representations of all the confectated animals of Egypt. Hence was the afcent to the fepulchre of the king, on the fummit of which was placed a circle of gold in thickness one cubit, and three hundred and fixty-five in circumference ; each cubit corresponded to a day in the year, and on it were engraved the rising and fetting of the flars for that day, with fuch aftrological indications as the fuperfition of the Egyptians had affixed to them. Cambyfes is faid to have carried off this circle when he ravaged Egypt. Such, according to hifterians, was the tomb of Olymandyas, which furpaffed all others, as well by its wealth as by the workmanship of the skilful artifts employed *."

I dare not, Sir, warrant all that Diodorus Siculus advances on the faith of preceding writers; for in his time the greatest part of these edifices were no longer in existence. Nay, I confess that, in any other country, fuch marvellous edifices would pafs for mere chimaras; but in this land of fecundity, which feems to have been first honoured by the creative genius of the arts, they acquire probability. Let us examine the remains of those monuments, and our eyes will oblige us to believe in miracles. These remains are heaped together near Medinet-Abou +, in the circum-ference of about half a league. The temple, vestibules, and periftyles, prefent only piles of ruins, among which fome pyramidal gates rear their heads, whole folidity has rendered them indeftructible; bur the numerous coloffal figures defcribed by Diodorus, though mutilated, still fubfist. On a line with it is another of spotted marble, black and white, thirty feet long, with many hieroglyphics feelptured on its back. In the space between them, the ground is covered with fiagments of columns, and broken fatues, denoting the arrangement of the veftibules. Beyond are two other codoffal flatues, totally disfigured; and a hundred fathom still further the traveller is ftruck with aftonishment at the fight of two gigantic figures, which feem like rocks, and are feated befide each other. Their pedeftals are nearly equal, and formed fron, blocks of p anite thirty feet long, and eighteen wide. The fmalleft of their ftatues is also one fole flone; the cher, the largeft in Eg.pt, is formed of fire different pieces of granite, and broken in the middle. This fhould feem to be the flatue of Ofymandyas*, for we find two figures, fculptured in baffo-relievo, the length of his legs, and rifing one third as high as himfelf. Thefe were the mother and daughter of this prince. The other coloffus, of one fingle ftone, correfponding to the dimensions Diodorus Siculus gives, alfo reprefented the mother of the king. You will form fome idea of the gigantic fize of the grand coloffus, when you are rold that its foot alone is near eleven feet long, which answers to the feven cubits of Diodorus. This statue, the half of which remains on its base, and which Strabo calls the ftatue of Meinnon, uttered a found at fun-rifing. Its fame formerly was very great. Several writers have spoken of it with enthusiasm, regarding it as one of the feven wonders of the world. A crowd of Greek and Latin inferiptions, which are flill legible on the bafe and legs of the coloffus, atteft that princes, generals, governors, and men of all conditions, have heard this miraculous found. You know, Sir, what the judicious Strabo thought, and, I hope, you will be of his opinion. Such, Sir, are the remains of Thebes, and her hendred gates, the antiquity of which is loft in the obfcurity of ages, and which still contains proofs of the perfection of the arts in those most diftant times. An here is fublime, all majeffic. Its kings idem to have acquired the glory of never dying, while their obelifks and colofial ftatues exift, and to have only laboured for immortality. cific Ocean, with the Hebrew.— From the 8th wol. of the Archæologia.

My dear Friend,

YOU know my opinion as to the originality of the Hebrew language: to this you must attribute the trouble I am now giving you.

If there was a time when all the inhabitants of the world fpoke Hebrew, then we are juftified in our attempts at tracing to that primary fource any word in any language fpoken on the habitable globe: and an argument connected with thefe data, though it may not carry conviction with it, will not, I hope, be confidered, primâ facie, as abfurd and impoffible.

It is my opinion, then, that the word tabco, which is fo common in all the iflands of the Pacific Ocean, and which occurs fo very frequently in the journals of our circumnavigators, is, poljibly, of Hebrew origin.

At leaft thus much is certain, that the Hebrew word העובה Taooba, from העובה, has the fame precife fignification with the word Taboo, as ufed in the Sandwich and Friendly ifles, &c.

The word and as a verb fignifies transitively, to loath, naufeate, abominate, both in a natural and mental fenfe. From hence is derived nutar Taaob-a, and nutar Taoob-ath, an abomination.

It occurs in feveral places of the facred writings; but the three following inftances are fufficiently in point for my purpole, viz. to fhew that the effect of that abomination we fpeak of, was interdictory, and that to a very high degree, which is exactly the fenfe in which it feems to occur in the journals of Captain Cook, &c. with the flight transpofition of one vowel.

den to ufe, before their eyes, andwill they not ftone us ?"

There is little doubt, that Mofes in this place alludes to the wellknown Egyptian hiftories of Ifis and Ofiris, and that the core was the taboo'd animal which it was fo hazardous to facrifice in Egypt.

Herodotus gives us the reafon in his Euterpe :

Τὸς μὲν ἐν καθαρὸς βῦς τὸς ἐρσενας, καὶ τὸς μοσχὸς οἱ ϖάκες Λἰγύπἰοι ᢒύεσι· τὰς δὲ Ͽηλέας οὐ σφι ἔζεςι Ͽίειν· ἀλλὰ ἰραὶ ἶισι τῆς Ἰσιος. τὸ γὰς τῆς Ἰσιος ἀγαλμα, ἐἰν γυναικήιου, βεκέςων ἐςι, καθάπες Ἐλλενες τὴν Ἱῦν γράζεσι· καὶ τὰς βὲς τὰς Ͽηλίας Αἰγύπλιοι ϖάκες ὑμοίως σέβοςλαι, ϖζοβάπων ϖάκων μάλιςα μακρῶ.

"All the Egyptians facrifice bulls, and bull-calves which are free from blemift; but cows they are forbidden to offer up, for they are koly to lfis. For the reprefentation of his is that of a female with a cow's horns, as the Greeks paint lö, and all the Egyptians do thus venerate cows (boves feeminas) far more than all other cattle."

In confequence of this, their behaviour to perfons coming from a country not fo ferupalous gives us a moft perfect idea of the taboo.

Τῶν ἕινεκα, ἕτ' ἀιἡρ Λιγύπιιος, ἔτε γυνὴ ἄιδρα ἘΕλληνα Φιλήσειεαν τῷ ϝόμαιι· ἐδε μαχαίεῃ ἀιδρός ἘΕλληνος χρήσείαι, ἐδ' ἀδέλοισι, ἐδε λιξητι, ἐδε κρίως καβαςῦ βόος διωτείμημένει ἘΕλληνικῆ μαχαίεῃ γεύσείαι.

"On this account no Egyptian man or woman would kifs a Greek, nor ufe the fword of a Greek, nor Grecian fpits, or caldrons; nor will they even tafte the flefh of a clean beaft, which is carved with a Grecian knife."

. This was the Tapob-a-Mizräim in its effects, which are exactly analogous to those of the Taboo.

The tenor of thefe obfervations is fupported by the Jewifh Rabbinical Comment, called Targum Onkelos, on Genefis xliii. 32. quoted by the ingenious and learned Mr. Parkhurft in his Lexicon, on the word upn, where it is faid, "For the Egyptians could not eat bread with the Hebrews, becaufe the beafts which the Egyptians worfhipped the Hebrews eat."

If I miltake not, the Taboo of the islands has fome connection, not accurately understood, with their religious tenets.

This conjecture will receive additional firength, if in the courfe of future enquiry there should appear, as I cannot but suffect will be the case, as marked an affinity between other words in the two languages, expressive of the fame ideas; Mattee, from nn, feems to be here in point.

I wifh I had leifure and abilities to enter more deeply into fuch an investigation.

The fubject viewed in any light whatever is not uninterefting; and no argument in favour of the primævity of the Hebrew language is unimportant. Refearches of this nature, we underftand, are now making, under the direction of a great princefs, as well as by the affiduous care of learned individuals. 1 am fully perfuaded, that thefe refearches will terminate in fome new difcoveries of the connection between the language of every kingdom upon earth, with that prefumed to have been spoken by Adam and Noah.

Observations on a Picture by Zuccaro, from Lord Falkland's Collection, supposed to represent the Game of Primero. By the Hon. Daines Barrington. Inscribed to the Rev. Mr. Bowle. From the same work.

Inner Temple, May 4, 1785. Conceive that the following account of a picture, which was fold laft week at Greenwood's auction-room in Leicefter-Fields, may be interefting to the fociety. It originally belonged to the great and good lord Falkland; from whom it defcended to the late vifcount of that title, who died not long fince,

According to tradition in the family it was painted by Zuccaro; and reprefented lord Burleigh playing at cards with three other perfons, who, from their drefs, appear to be of diffinction, each of them having two rings on the fame fingers of both their hands.

The cards are marked as at prefent, and differ from those of more modern times only by being narrower and longer; eight of these he upon the table, with the blank fide uppermost, whilst four remain in each of their hands.

Other particulars deferving notice are, that one of the players exhibits his cards, which are, to the beft of my recollection, the knave of hearts, with the ace, 7 and 6 of clubs. There are alfo confiderable heaps of gold and filver on the table, fo that thefe dignified perfonages feem to have played for what would not at prefent be called a cbicken ftake.

It fhould feem, that the game is a Spanish one, called Primero, which probably might have been introduced by Philip the Second, or fome of his fuite, whils he was in England, and was much in vogue during the reign of queen Elizabeth, as appears by the following passage from Shakespeare :

> " ____ I left him at Primero " With the duke of Suffolk." Henry VIII. A& V. Sc. 1.

I have taken fome pains to find outhow this formerly favourite game was played, and find the following account of it in Duchat's notes on the twenty-fecond chapter of the first book of Rabelais, in which all the games, with which Gargantua amused himself, are mentioned, amounting to nearly two hundred, and the fecond of which is Primero.

I fhall fubjoin a translation of Duchat's note on this word, which feems most clearly to prove, that Primero is the game deferibed in this picture of lord Falkland's.

"Each player hath four cards, "which are dealt one by one; a "feven is the higheft in point of "number, [which he can avail himfelf of,] and counts for "twenty-one; the next is the fix, and counts for fixteen; the next is the five, and counts for fifteen; "the ace reckons for the fame "number, but the duce, trois, and quatre, count only for their re-"fpective number of points."

Duchat adds, that the knave of hearts moth commonly is pitched upon for the quinola, which the player may make what card, and of what colour he pleafes *; if the cards are all of different colours, the player wins primero, and if they are all of the fame colour, he wins the fluih *.

From this outline of Primero. there feems to be little doubt but that it is the game which the painter means to defcribe ; and that the perfon exhibiting his cards to the fpectators hath won the flus, flux, or flush; for his three clubs are the best cards for counting, and his knave of hearts may double the beft of these, whilst it also becomes a club, and thus wins by the number of points, as well as by the four cards becoming a flush of clubs.

Whilft I have thus been endeavouring to explain this picture of Zuccaro, fome other observations have occurred, with regard to cards in the more early centuries, which with the indulgence of the fociety I may poffibly lay before them hereafter.

DAINES BARRINGTON.

Objervations on the Antiquity of Cardplaying in England, by the Hon. Daines Barrington. Infcribed to the Rev. Mr. Bowle. From the Same work.

SINCE the last paper which I had the honour to lay before the fociety, giving fome account of a picture representing lord Burleigh with three others playing at cards +, I have found fome confirmation that those exhibited in the hand of one of these players relate to Primero t, becaufe the Sydney papers mention § that queen Elizabeth formed a party at this game with the Lord Treasurer, Mr. Secretary, and the lord North.

I am fince informed likewife, that this picture was purchased by Mr. Bird of Hanover-Square.

I proceed to give the beft account I am able of the first introduction of this pattime now become fo general.

The earliest mention of cards that I have yet stumbled upon, is in Mr. Anftis's Hiftory of the Garter II. where he cites the following paffage from the Wardrobe Rolls, in the fixth year of Edward the First.

"Waltero Sturton ad opus regis ad ludendum ad quatuor reges vills. vd. q" from which entry Mr. Anftis with fome probability conjectures, that playing cards were not unknown at the latter end of the thirteenth century; and perhaps what I fhall add may carry with it fome fmall confirmation of what he thus supposes.

Edward the First (when prince of Wales) ferved nearly five years in Syria, and therefore, whilft military operations were fuspended, muft naturally have wifhed fome fedentary amufements. Now the Afiatics fcarcely ever change their

" The Spanish term is " flux," which fignifies the same with our word flush, and which, when applied to cards, imports that they are all of the fame colour : x in that language, moreover, hath the power of  $\beta$ , or nearly fo.

cuftoms; and, as they play at cards (though in many refpects different from ours*) it is not improbable that Edward might have been taugh the game, ad quatuor reges, whilf the continued fo long in this part of the globe.

If however this article in the wardrobe account is not allowed to allude to playing cards, the next writer who mentions the more early introduction of them is P. Meneftrier +, who, from fuch another article in the privy purfe expences of the kings of France, fays, that they were provided for Charles the Sixth by his limner, after that king was deprived of his fenfes in 1392.-The entry is the following, " Donné " a Jacquemin Gringonneur, Pein-" tre, pour trois jeux de Cartes, " a or et a diverses couleurs, de " plusieurs devises, pour porter " vers le dit Seigneur Roi pour son " abatement, cinquante fix fols " Parifis."

I must own, that J have fome doubts whether this entry really relates to playing cards, though it is admitted that trois jeux de cartes would now fignify three packs of cards. The word jeu however had anciently a more extensive import than at prefent, and Cotgrave in his Distionary applies it to a cheft of violins, jeu de violons. I therefore rather conceive that the trois joux de Cartes, in this article, means three fets of illuminations upon paper; carte originally fignifying no more t.

If this be the right interpretation of the terms, we fee the reafon why Gringonneur, limner to Charles VI. was employed, and thefe three fets of illuminations would entertain the king during his infanity by their variety, as three fets of wooden prints would now amufe a child better than one; whilft on the other hand one pack of cards would have been fufficient for a mad king, who probably would tear them in pieces upon the firft run of bad luck.

How this fame king moreover was to be taught or could play a game at cards whill he was out of his fenses is not very apparent; and the physician, who permitted fuch amusement to his majesty, seems not to have confidered the ill confequence to his health by loffes at play, which fo much inflame the paffions. Some ftrefs likewife may be laid upon this entry not being followed by another || of money iffued to the winners, as there feems to be little doubt, but that his maefty in this fate of mind must have been, in modern terms, a pigcon to his hawks of courtiers.

* " For their paffimes within doors they have cards differing fro mours in the "figures and number of fuits." Pietro della Valle.

Niehbur (in his Travels) also mentions the use of Chinese cards, p. 139, and fays, that the Arabians call this amutement Lob-ul-kamer. We have cheis hise-wise from the Afratics.

Another observation to be made upon this entry is, that the year 1392 cannot be juftly fixed upon as the date of this invention, for though Charles the Sixth loft his fenfes at that time, yet he lived thirty years atterward, so it will not be fair to fuppole these cards were made the first year of his phrenfy, but to take the middle year of these thirty, which would bring it to 1407. At that time, indeed, this amufement feems to have become more general, as in 1426 * no perfon was permitted to have in their house " tab-" liers, eschiquiers, quartes," &c. which laft word I conclude to be the fame with cartes or cards +.

It feems moreover to afford a firong prefumption againft Mr. Anflis's explanation of the game od quatuor reges (known to our Edward the Firft), that cards are not alluded to by fuch an article in the wardrobe rolls, becaufe we hear nothing about them, either in Rymer's Fœdera, or our flatute book, till towards the latter end of the reign of Henry VIII ‡.

This fort of amufement, however, was not unknown to the court at least of Henry VII. for in the year 1502, when the daughter of that king was married to James the Fourth of Scotland, fhe played at cards foon after her arrival at Edinburgh ||.

Cards had also found their way into Spain about the fame time; for Herrera mentions §, that upon the conquest of Mexico (which happened in 1519), Montezuma took great pleasure in feeing the Spaniards thus amufing themselves.

And here it may not be improper to obferve, that if the Spaniards were not the first inventors of cards (which at least I conceive them to have been), we owe to them undoubtedly the game of ombre (with its imitations of quadrille, &c.), which obtained fo long throughout Europe till the introduction of whifk **.

The very name of this game is Spanish, as ombre fignifies a man; and when we now fay I am the omber, the meaning is, that I am the man who defy the other players, and will win the stake. The terms for the principal cards are also Spanish, viz. Spadill, Manill, Basto, Punto, Matadors, &c ++."

The king is a man crowned as in our cards; but the next in degree is a perfon on horfeback named el caballo, nor have they any queen.— The third (or knave with us) is termed foco (or the footman) being inferior to the horfeman.

Another capital game on the cards (piquet) we feem to have adopted from Spain, as well as ombre, it having been thence introduced into France about 140 years ago. The French term of piquet hath no fignification but that of a little axe, and therefore is not taken from any thing which is remarkable in this game; whereas the Spanith name of cientos (or a bundred) alludes to the number of points which win the flake 1.

Upon the whole, the Spaniards having given fignificant terms to their cards, the figures of which they still retain, as well as being the acknowledged introducers of ombre, feem to give them the beft pretensions of being the original inventors of this amusement. If they had borrowed cards from the French, furely they would at the fame time have adopted their names and figures, as well as their principal games from that nation ||. which on the contrary (in ombre and piquet at least) have been introduced from Spain.

Nor do other reafons feem wanting why the Spaniards fhould have excelled in card-playing before the other nations of Europe.

Du Four, entitled Longuerusnu; in which the writer fays, he had feen fome antient Italian cards fiven or eight inches long, in which the pope was reprefented, and from thence (though a Frenchman) afcribes the invention of cards to the Italians. This is, however, a mere iffe dixit, without any other fact or argument.

Another of our learned members (Dr. Woide) refers me to a German publication by Mr. Breithoff, in which he cites an authority, that cards were ufed in Germany to early as A. D. 1300, having been brought from Arabia or India.

Our late worthy member (Mr. Tuter) hath also been to obliging as to flow me fome antient cards which belonged to Dr. Stukeley, and which were nearly of an equal length to those deferibed by Mr. Du Four. The pack, however, was far from complete, and therefore little could be inferred from them. This was also the case with the pack of Italian cards mentioned by Mr. Du Four.

t See Du Chat's notes on that chapter of Rabelais, in which Pantagruel is faid to have played at fo many games.

Now Charles the Fifth fucceeded to the crown of that kingdom in 1518, as well as to the new conqueits and treafures of the Weftern India, whilft his other most extensive dominions made his monarchy nearly universal. France at the fame time was at the loweft ebb, their king having been taken prifoner at the battle of Pavia in 1524. It is not therefore extraordinary, that the country in which fo great riches and fuch extensive territorics were united, fhould have produced the greatest number of games and gamesters.

It fhould feem that England hath no pretence to enter the lifts with Spain or France for the invention of cards, unlefs Edward the Firft having played ad quature reges fhould be fo confidered; and I have already fuggetted, that the finding nothing further relative to this paffime till 1502 † affords a firong prefumption that the quatuer reges were not playing cards  $\frac{1}{2}$ .

During the reigns of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. this amufement feems not to have been very common in England, as fearcely any mention of it occurs either in Rymer's Fœdera or the flatutebook ||. It is not improbable, however, that Philip the Second, with his tuite, coming from the court of Churles the Fifth, made the use of cards 'much more general than it had been, of which fome prefumptive proofs are not wanting.

We name two of the fuits clubs and fpades, when neither of those fuits in the common cards answer at all luch appellation. If the Spanish cards, however, are examined (which I have the honour of prefenting to the fociety), it will be found that each card hath a real club in the first of these fuits, and a real fword, efpada (rendered by us fpade), in the fecond.

There feems to be little doubt, therefore, but that the cards ufed during the reign of Philip and Mary, and probably the more early part of queen  $\pm$  lizabeth, were Spanith §, though they were afterwards changed for the French, being of a more fimple figure, and more eafily imported. Eut I have been furnished by our worthy and learned member (Mr. Affie) with a ftill more decifive proof that cards were originally made in Spain, which I fend herewith for the infpection of the fociety.

[This was an impression from a block of wood, and undoubtedly the cover of a pack of cards. The inscription upon it is as follows:]

" Cartas finnas faictes par Je (fuppofed contraction for Jean or John) Hauvola y (Edward Warman) the last name having been inferted in a new piece of wood, laid into the original block."

The first words of this infeription, viz. cartas finnas (Juperfine cards) are Spanish, which are followed by two of French, (viz. faictes par, or made by) Jean Hauvola, y (y is generally used in Spanish for the conjunction and), and the two last words, viz. Edward Warman, were not in the block of wood, when first cut into.

The whole of this infeription, being rendered into English, runs thus:

" Superfine cards made by John Hauvola, and (Edward Warman)," the laft name being an addition in the room of John Hauvola's first partner.

Now I conceive that this advertifement was used by a card-maker refident in France, who notified the wares he had to fell in the Spatish terms of cartas finnas, or fuperline cards, because those which had been made in Spain at that time were in the greatest vogue.

The two words which follow are French, (failles par, or made b.), which were probably in that language, that the French reader might more readily understand the advertifement, than if the whole was in Spanish. Thes a London shopkeeper would write on his shop in English that he fold wermicelle, though he retains the Italian term of vermicelli (or little werms) for the ware he wants to difpose of.

But this is not the whole that may be inferred from this curious cover, for at each corner are the ngures from which the four fuits or cards are denominated in Spain, viz. cups, fivords, clubs, and pieces of money, whill at the top are the arms of Caltille and Leon.

It feems fairly therefore to be inferred from the fuperfeription on this cover, that cards could not be then difpofed of to advantage in France, unlefs there was fonce appearance of their having been originally brought from Spain, where being first invented they were probably made in greater perfection.

I begin to be fenfible, that what I have thus ventured to lay before the fociety on the first invention of cards is rather become of an unreafonable length; from their wonted goodnefs to me, however, I will trefpais a little longer upon their time, by adding fome few obfervations, which have occurred with regard to fome of the games which formerly had obtained the greatest vogue.

Primero + (undoubtedly a Spanith game) feems to have been chiefly played by our gentry till perhaps as late as the Refloration. Many other games however are mentioned in Dodiley's Collection of Old Plays, as " Gleek, Crimp, Mount-Saint, Noddy, Knave out of Doors, Saint Lodam, Poft and Pair, Wide Ruff, and Game of 'Trumps.''

To Primero the game of Ombre fucceeded, and was probably introduced by Catharine of Portugal, the queen of Charles the Second, as Waller hath a poem

" On a card torn at Onbre by the queen."

It likewife continued to be in vogue for fome time in the prefent century, for it is Belinda's game in the Rape of the Lock, where every incident in the whole deal is fo deferibed, that when ombre is forgotten (and it is almost fo already) it may be revived with posterity from that most admirable poem *.

I remember moreover to have feen three-cornered tables in houfes which had old furniture, and which were made purpofely for this game, the number of players being only three.

Quadrille (a fpecies of ombre) obtained a vogue upon the difute of the latter, which it maintained till Whifk was introduced, which now prevails not only in England, but in most of the civilized parts of Europe.

If it may not be possibly supposed that the game of trumps (which I have before taken notice of, as alluded to in one of the old plays contained in Dodfley's Collection) is Whifk, I rather conceive that the first mention of that game is to be found in Farquhar's Beaux Stratagem, which was written in the very beginning + of the prefent century. It was then played with what were called favabbers t, which were poffibly to termed, becaufe they, who had certain cards in their hand, were entitled to take up a fhare of the flake, independent of the general event of the game ||. The fortunate, therefore, clearing the board of this extraordinary stake, might be compared by feamen to the j-wabbers (or cleaners of the deck) in which fenfe the term is still ufed.

Be this as it may, whifk feems never to have been played upon principles till about fifty years ago, when it was much fludied by a fet of gentlemen who frequented the Crown coffee-houfe in Bedford-Row §: before that time it was

* As for the game at chefs in Vida's Latin poems, I never could follow it, after line 220, when feveral pawns are taken on each fide without being particularifed. The Latin however cannot be too much admired of this elegant poem, nor the defoription of many moves.

Swabbers therefore much refemble the taking up part of the flake for the aces at quadrille, and are properly banifled from a game of fo much fkill as which, becaufe they are apt to divert the player's attention.

§ I have this information from a gentleman who is now eighty-fix years of age. The first lord Folkstone was another of this fet.

The hot baths used over all Egypt, and the manner of bathing described; with observations on the benefits arifing from them; on the practice of the noomen who bathe once or twice a nucle; and comparijons between these baths and these of the encient Greeks. From Mong. Savary's Letters on Egypt.

Grand Cairo.

"HE hot baths, known in the remoteil ages, and cclebrated by Homer, who paints the manners of his times, have here preferved all their allurements and falubrity; necessity has rendered them common in a country where perfpiration is abundant; and pleafure has preferved the practice. Mahomet, who knew their utility, has made the use of them a religious precept. They have been fuperficially defcribed by moft travellers; but as the habit I am in of frequenting them has given me leifure to examine them attentively, I fhall endeavour to be more particular and fatisfactory *.

ing the bath is a great chamber, in the form of a rotunda, with an open roof, to let the pure air circulate freely. A fpacious alcove carpeted is carried round, and divided into compartments. in which the bathers leave their clothes. In the centre is a fountain, which plays into a refervoir, and has a pleasing effect.

When undreffed a napkin is tied round the middle; fandals are put on, and a narrow paffage is entered, where the heat firth begins to be felt; the door fluts, and twenty paces further a fecond opens, which is the entrance to a paffage at right angles with the fuft. Here the heat augments, and those who fear to expose themselves too fuddenly to its effects flop fome time in a marble hall before they enter. The bath itfelf is a spacious vaulted chamber, paved and lined with marble; befide it are four small rooms: a vapour continually rifes from a fountain and ciftern of hot water, with which the burnt perfumes mingle +.

imprisoned in a kind of tub, where the body cannot reft at its eafe ; but, reclining on a fpread fheet, and the head fupported on a fmall pillow, they freely take what posture they pleafe, while clouds of odoriferous vapours envelope and penetrate every pore.

Having repofed thus fome time, a gentle moitture diffuses itself over the body; a fervant comes, gently preffes and turns the bather, and when the limbs are flexible, makes the joints crack without trouble; then maffes*, and feems to knead the body without giving the flighteft fenfation of pain.

This done he puts on a fluff glove and continues rubbing long, and freeing the fkin of the patient, which is quite wet, from every kind of fcaly obstruction, and all imperceptible particles that clog the pores, till it becomes as fmooth as fatin; he then conducts the bather into a cabinet, pours a lather of perfumed foap on the head, and retires.

The ancients honoured their guefis fill more, and treated them after a more voluptuous manner. While Telemachus was at the court of Neftor +, " the beauteous Polycafte, youngeft of the daughters of the king of Pylos, led the fon of Ulviffes to the bath, washed him with her own hands, and, having rubbed his body with precious ointments, clothed him in rich garments and a fhining mantle." Nor were Pifistratus and Telemachus worfe treated in the palace of Menelaus 1, the beauties of which having admired, " they were conducted to marble bafons, in which the bath prepared, where beauteous was flaves washed them, rubbed them with odorous oils, and clothed them in fine garments, and magnificent furred robes §."

The room into which the bather retires has two water cocks, one for cold, the other for hot water; and he washes himfelf. The attendant prefently returns with a depilatory pomatum ||, which inftantly eradicates hair wherever applied. It is in general use both with men and women in Egypt.

Being well washed and purified, the bather is wrapped up in het linen, and follows his guide through various windings which lead to the outward apartment, while this infensible transition from heat to cold prevents all inconvenience . Being come to the alcove, a bed is ready prepared, on which the perion no fooner lies down than a boy comes, and begins to prefs with his delicate hands all parts of the body, in order to dry them perfectly: the linen is once more changed, and the boy gently rubs the callous fkin of the feet with pumice-flore, then brings a pipe and Moka coffee `.

Coming from a bath filled with hot vapour, in which excellive perfpiration bedewed every limb, into a fpacious apartment and the open open air, the lungs expand and refpire pleafure : well kneaded, and as it were regenerated, the blood circulates freely, the body feels a voluptaous eafe, a flexibility till then unknown, a lightness as if relieved from fome enormous weight, and the man almost fancies himfelf newly born, and beginning firft to live. A glowing confcioufnefs of existence diffuses itself to the very extremities; and, while thus yielding to the most delightful fenfations, ideas of the most pleafing kind pervade and fill the foul; the imagination wanders through worlds which itfelf embellishes, every where drawing pictures of happinels and delight. If life be only a fuccefilon of ideas, the vigour, the rapidity, with which the memory then re-traces all the knowledge of the man, would lead us to believe that the two hours of delicious calm which fucceed bathing are an age.

Such, Sir, are thefe baths, the ufe of which was fo ftrongly recommended by the ancients, and the pleafures of which the Egyptians still enjoy. Here they prevent or exterminate rheumatisms, catarrhs, and those difeases of the fkin which the want of perfpiration occafions. Here they find a radical cure for that fatal difease which attacks the powers of generation, and the remedies for which are fo dangerous in Europe+. Here they rid themfelves of those uncomfortable sensations for common among other nations, who have not the fame regard to cleanlinefs.

The women are paffionately fond of these baths, whither they go at least once a week, taking with them flaves accustomed to the office. More fenfual than men, after the ufual process they wash the body, and particularly the head, with rofewater. There their attendants braid their long black hair, with which, initead of powder and pomatum, they mingle precious effences .----There they blacken the rim of the eye-lid, arch the brows with cobel‡, and ftain the nails of their hands and feet of a golden yellow with Their linen and their benna ||.

* The whole expense of bathing thus to me was half a crown; but the common people go fimply to perfpire in the bath, wash themselves, and give three half-pence or two-pence at departing.

† Tournefort, who had taken the vapour both at Conflantinople, where they are much lefs coreful than at Grand Cairo, thinks they injure the lungs; but longer experience would have convinced him of his error. There are no people who practife this bathing more than the Egyptians, nor any to whom fuch difeafes are lefs known. They are almost wholly unacquainted with pulmonic complimits.

robes having been paft through the fweet vapour of aloes wood, and their dreffing ended, they remain in the outward apartment, and pafs the day in feafting, while finging girls come and dance, and fing foothing airs, or recount amorous adventures.

The days of bathing are feftive days among the Egyptian women; they deck themfelves magnificently, and under the long veil and mantle which hide them from the public eye wear the richeft fluffs. They undrefs themfelves in prefence of each other, and their vanity extends to their very drawers, which in winter are made of fluffs inwove with filk and gold, and in fummer of worked muslin. Ruffles and lace are unknown to them, but their shifts are made of cotton and filk, as light and transparent as gauze. Rich fashes of Caffimire * bind up their floating robes, and two creicents of fine pearls sparkle amidst the black hair that shades their temples, while diamonds enrich the Indian handkerchief with which they bind their brows. Such are the Georgians and Circafians, whom the Turks purchase for their wives. They are neat to excefs, and walk in an atmosphere of perfumes; and, though their luxury is hidden from the public, it furpaffes that of the European women in their own houfes.

The excefive jealoufy of the Turks makes them pretend, that in this warm climate, where nature is fo powerful, and women are irrefiftibly prone to pleafure, an intercourfe between the fexes would be dangerous; they therefore abufe the right of flrength, and hold them in flavery, though they thereby increafe the violence of their pations, and make them ready to feize the first opportunity of retaliation: ignorant, no doubt, that though free women may be won, flaves need no winning."

"E GYPT, as well as Italy, has her improvifatore, called Almai, or learned; which title they obtain by being more carefully educated than other women. They form a clafs very fameus in the country, to be admitted into which it is neceffary to poffefs a fine voice, eloquence, the rules of grammar †, and be able to compofe and fing extempore verfes, adapted to the occafion. The Almai know all new forgs by rote, their memory is flored with the beit Moals ‡ and tales, tales, they are prefent at all feftivals, and are the chief ornament of banquets. They place them in a raifed orcheftra or pulpit, where they fing during the teaft, after which they defcend and form dances, which no way refemble ours. They are pantomimes that reprefent the common incidents of life. Love is their mual fubject. The fupplenefs of these dancers bodies is inconceivable, and the flexibility of their features, which take imprefiions characteristic of the parts they play at will, aftonishing. The indecency of their attitudes is often exceflive; each look, each geiture speaks, and in a manner fo forcible as not poffibly to be mifunderftood. They throw afide modefly with their veils. When they begin to dance a long and very light filk robe floats on the ground, negligently girded by a fash; long black hair, perfumed, and in treffes, descends over their shoulders; the shift, transparent as gauze, fcarcely conceals the fkin : as the action proceeds, the various forms and contours the body can affume feem progreffive ; the found of the flute, the caftanets, the tambour de hasque, and cymbals, regulate, increase, or flacken their iteps. Words, adapted to fuch like fcenes, inflame them more, till they appear intoxicated, and become frantic bacchantes. Forgetting all referve, they then wholly abandon themfelves to the ditorder of their fenfes, while an indelicate people, who wish nothing should be left to the imagination, redouble their applause.

These Almai are admitted into all harems; they teach the women the new airs, recount amorous tales, and recite poems in their prefence, which are interesting by being pictures of their own manners. They learn them the mysteries of their art, and instruct them in lascivious dances. The minds of thefe women are cultivated, their converfation agreeable, they fpeak their language with purity, and, habitually addicting themselves to poetry, learn the most winning and fonorous modes of expression. Their recital is very graceful; when they fing, nature is their only guide: fome of the airs I have heard from them were gay, and in a light and lively measure, like fome of ours; but their excellence is most feen in the pathetic. When they rehearse a moal, in the manner of the ancient tragic ballad, by dwelling upon affecting and plaintive tones, Abulfeda has preferved the conclusion of a moal, fung by Ommia over the cavity in which his kinfmen had been thrown after the defeat of Beder.

they infpire melancholy, which infenfibly augments, till it melts in tears. The very Turks, enemies as they are to the arts, the Turks themfelves, pafs whole nights in listening to them. Two people fing together fometimes, but, like their orcheftra, they are always in unifon : accompaniments in mufic are only for enlightened nations; who, while melody charms the ear, with to have the mind employed by a just and inventive modulation. Nations, on the contrary, whole feelings are oftener appealed to than their underftanding, little capable of catching the fleeting beauties of harmony, delight in those fimple founds which immediately attack the heart, without calling in the aid of reflection to increafe fenfibility.

The Ifraelites, to whom Egyptian manners, by long dwelling in Egypt, were become natural, alfo had their Almai. At Jerufalem, as at Cairo, it feems they gave the women leffons. St. Mark relates a fact which proves the power of the Oriental dance over the heart of man *.

"And when a convenient day was come, that Herod on his birthday made a fupper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee;

" And when the daughter of the faid Herodias came in, and danced, and pleafed Herod, and them that fat with him, the king faid unto the damfel, Afk of me whatfoever thou wilt, and I will give it thee.

"And he fware unto her, Whatfoever thou shalt ask of me, I will give it thee, unto the half of my kingdom. " And the went forth, and faid unto her mother, What thall I afk? and the faid, The head of John the Baptift.

"And fhe came in ftraightway with hafte unto the king, and afked, faying, I will that thou give me by and by in a charger the head of John the Baptift.

"And inimediately the king fent an executioner, and commanded his head to be brought, and he went and beheaded him in the prifon."

The Almai are prefent at marriage ceremonies, and precede the bride, playing on inffruments. They allo accompany funerals, at which they fing dirges, utter groans and lamentations, and imitate every mark of grief and defpair. Their price is high, and they feldom attend any but wealthy people and great lords.

I was lately invited to a fplendid fupper, which a rich Venetian merchant gave the receiver-general of the finances of Egypt. The Almai fung various airs during the banquet, and afterwards the praifes of the principal guefts. I was molt pleafed by an ingenious allegory, in which Cupid was the fuppofed interlocutor. There was play after fupper, and I perceived handfuls of fequins were occafionally fent to the fingers. This testival brought them infry guineas at least; they are not, however, always io well paid.

The common people have their Almai alfo, who are a fecond order of thefe women, imitators of the first; but have neither their elegance, grace, nor knowledge. They are feen every where; the public fquares and walks round Grand

Grand Cairo.

"N Europe \* women act parts of great confequence, and often reign fovereigns on the world's vatt theatre; they influence manners and morals, and decide on the moft important events; the fate of nations is frequently in their hands. How different in Egypt, where they are bowed down by the fetters of flavery, condemned to fervitude, and have no influence in public affairs! Their empire is confined within the walls of the harem. There are their graces and charms entombed: the circle of their life extends not beyond their own family and domeflic duties  $\pm$ .

Their first care is to educate their children, and a numerous posterity is their most fervent wish; public respect and the love of their husband are annexed to fruitfulnefs. This is even the prayer of the poor, who earns his bread by the fweat of his brow; and, did not adoption alleviate grief when nature is unkind, a barien woman would be inconfolable. The mother daily fuckles her child, whofe infant fmiles, added to frequent pregnancy, recompences all the cares and pains they incurred. Milk difeafes, and those maladies which dry up the juices of the youthful wife, who fends her offspring to be nurtured by a ftranger, are here unknown. That mothers should fuckle their young is a law as ancient as the world; it is expressly commanded by Mahomet. " Let mothers fuckle their children full two years, if the child does not quit the breaft; but fhe fhall be permitted to wean it with the confent of her hufband \*." Ulyfles, in the Elyfian fields, beholds his mother, his tender mother there, who had fed him with her milk, and nurtured him in infancy  $\uparrow$ .

When obliged by circumflances to take a nurle, they do not treat her as a ftranger; the becomes one of the family, and paffes her days amidit the children fhe has fuckled, by whom fhe is cherifhed and honoured as a fecond mother.

Racine, who poffeffed not only genius but all the knowledge neceffary to render genius conlpicuous, flored with the learning of the fineft works of Greece, and well acquainted with Oriental manners, gives Phædra her nurfe as her fole confidante. The wretched queen, infected by a guilty paffion fhe could not conquer, while the fatal fecret opprefied a heart that durft not unload itfelf, could not refolve to fpeak her thoughts to the tender Œnone, till the latter had faid,

Cruelle, quand ma foi yous a t-elle dégue? Songez-yous, qu'en naiffant, mes bras yous ont régue !

When, cruel queen, by me were you deceiv'd ?

Did I not first receive you in these arms ?

The harem is the cradle and fchool of infancy. The new-born feeble being is not there fwaddled and filleted up in a fwathe, the fource of a thousand difeases. Laid naked on a mat, exposed in a valt chamber to the pure air, he breathes freely, and with his delicate limbs fprawls at pleafure. The new clement in which he is to live is not entered with pain and tears. Daily bathed beneath his mother's eye, he grows apace; free to act, he tries his coming powers, rolls, crawls, rifes, and, flould he fall, cannet much hurt himfelf, on the carpet or mat which covers the floor 1.

He is not banished his father's houle when feven years old, and fent to college with the lofs of health and innocence; he does not, 'tis urue, acquire much learning; he perhaps can only read and write; but he is healthy, robutt, fears God, refpects old age, has filial piety, and delights in hofpitality; which virtues, continually practiled in his family, remain deeply engraven on his heart.

The daughter's education is the fame. Whalebone and bufks, which martyr European girls, they know not; they run naked, or only covered with a fluift, till fix years old, and the drefs they afterwards wear confines none of their limbs, but fuffers the body to take its true form, and nothing is more uncommon than rickety children and crooked people. Man rifes in all his majefty, and woman difplays every charm of perfon, in the eaft. In Georgia and Greece those fine marking outlines, those admirable forms, which the Creator gave the chief of his works, are beft preferved. Apelles would ftill find models worthy of his pencil there.

not wholly employ the women; every other domefile concern is theirs: they overlook their houfehold, and do not think themfelves debafed by preparing themfelves their own food, and that of their hufbands. Former cuftons, ftill fubfifting, render thefe cares duties. Thus Sarah haftened to bake cakes upon the hearth, when angels visited Abraham, who performed the rites of hofpitality. Menelaus thus entreats the departing Telemachus:--

- " Yet ftay, my friends, and in your chariot take
- " The nobleft prefents that our love can make;
- " Mean-time, commit we to our women's care
- "Some choice domestic viands to prepare "."

Subject to the immutable laws by which cuftom governs the Eaft, the women do not affociate with men, not even at table +, where the union of fexes produces mirth, and wit, and makes food more fweet. When the great incline to dine with one of their wives, fhe is informed, prepares the apartment, perfumes it with precious effences, procures the most delicate viands, and receives her lord with the utmost attention and refpect. Among the common people, the women ufually ftand, or fit in a corner of the room while the hufband dines, often hold the bafon for him to wash, and ferve him at table t. Cuftoms like thefe, which the Europeans rightly call barbarous, and exclaim against with juffice, appear fo natural here, that they do not fuspect it can be otherwife elfewhere. Such is the power of habit over man: what for ages has been, he supposes a law of nature.

Though thus employed, the Egyptian women have much leifure, which they fpend among their flaves, embroidering fashes, making veils, tracing defigns to decorate their fofas, and in spinning."

" Labour has its relaxations; pleasure is not banished the harem. The nurfe recounts the history of past times with a feeling which her hearers participate; cheerful and paffionate fongs are accompanied by the flaves with the tambour de bafque and caftanets. Sometimes the Almai come, to enliven the fcene with their dances and affecting recitals, and by relating amorous romances; and, at the close of the day, there is a repast, in which exquifite fruits and perfumes are ferved with profusion. Thus do they endeavour to charm away the dulnefs of captivity.

Not that they are wholly prifoners; once or twice a week they are permitted to go to the bath, and vifit female relations and friends. To bewail the dead is likewife a duty they are allowed to perform. I have often feen diftracted mothers round Grand Cairo, reciting funeral hymus over the tombs they had ftrewed with odoriferous plants."

She then receives compliments according to their manner +. "Why, my mother, or my fifter, have you been fo long absent? We fighed to fee you! Your prefence is an honour to our house; it is the happiness of our lives !" &c.

Slaves present coffee, sherbet, and confectionary; they laugh, talk, and play; a large difh is placed on the fofa, on which are oranges, pomegranates, bananas, and excellent melons. Water and rofewater mixed are brought in an ewer; and with them a filver bafon to wath the hands, and loud glee and merry conventation feafon the meal. The chamber is perfumed by wood of aloes in a brazier; and, the repail ended, the flaves dance to the found of cymbals, with whom the miffreiles often mingle. At parting they feveral times repeat, " God keep you in health! Heaven grant you a numerous off-pring! Heaven preferve your children, the delight and glory of your family 1 !"

While a visitor is in theharem, the hufband must not enter; it is the alylum of hospitality, and cannot be violated without fatal confequences; a cherifhed right, which the Egyptian women carefully maintain, being interested in its prefer-vation. A lover difguised like 2 woman may be introduced into the forbidden place §, and it is neceffary he should remain undifcovered : death would otherwife be his reward. In this country, where the paffions are excited by the climate, and the difficulty of gratifying them, love often produces tragical events.

The Turkifh women go, guarded by their eunuchs, upon the water alfo, and enjoy the charming profpects of the banks of the Nile. Their cabins are pleafant, richly embellifhed, and the boats well carved and painted. They are known by the blinds over the windows, and the mulic by which they are accompanied.

When they cannot go abroad they endeavour to be merry in their prifon. Toward fun-fetting they go on the terrace, and take the irefly air among the flowers which are there carefully reared. Here they often bathe; and thus at once enjoy the cool limpid water, the perfume of odoriferous plants, the bolony air, and the flarry hoft which finue in the firmament.

Thus Bathsheba bathed, when

The Turks oblige the public criers to five r they will flut their eyes when they call the people to prayer, that their wives may not be ieen from the high minarets. Another more certain precaution, which they take, is to choose the blind to perform this pious function.

Such, Sir, is the ufual life of the Egyptian women. Their duties are to educate their children, take care of their houfehold, and live retired with their family : their pleafures, to vifit, give feafts (in which they often yield to exceffive mirth and licentioufnefs) go on the water, take the air in orange-groves, and liften to the Almai. They deck themfelves as carefully to receive their acquaintance as French women do to allure the men. Ufually mild and timid, they become daring and turious when under the dominion of violent love : neither locks nor grim keepers can then preferibe bounds to their paffions; which, tho' death be fulpended over their head, they fearch the means to gratify, and are feldom unfuccefstul."

Curious account of the Chicken-Ovens, in Egypt. Extracted from the fame author.

SPEAKING of Mansoura, on the Damietta branch of the Nile, Monf. Savary Jays,—"Here are vath chicken-ovens; and, as Egypt is the only country where this mode of hatching is practifed, I will defcribe it.

The eggs are arranged in heaps in the lower ftory, and a fire of fun-dried cowdung kindled in the upper, morning and night, an hour each. This is repeated for eight days, and the building being fufficiently heated, the fire is put out, every aperture closed, and a part of the eggs heaped up below are carried above. The fuperintendant occasionally examines if it be neceffary to increase or diminish the heat. On the nineteenth day the chickens begin to move in their fhells, nibble with their beaks on the twentieth, endeavouring to break their prifon, and are ufually completely hatched on the twentyfirst : then do these heaps of eggs, apparently lifelefs, begin to move, and roll about the floor, and thoufands of little various coloured chickens to run and hop round the apartment. This fight is truly diverting. They are carried in panniers, and cried about the ftreets on the morrow, each houfe flocking itfelf at a half-penny a piece. Various authors have faid these fowls are not fo good as those hatched by the hen, but they are miftaken. А French cook I faw at Grand Cairo bought them every year, and when well fed they became excellent poultry. # An account of the KRIMEA, extracted from the Gentleman's Magazine for August 1786, page 644.

THE peninfula of the Krim, or Krimes is for or Krimea, is fituate directly to the fouth of St. Peterfburg, between the 51st and 54th degrees of latitude, and in 46 of longitude. Its fouthern and western coafts lie in the Euxine; its northern and eastern in the Rotten Sea and the Palus Mæotis. It is joined, however, to the continent, on the north, by a fmall neck of land, not more than nine verfts broad; the mean length and breadth of the peninfula itself being about 200 versts.

From the abovementioned ifthmus, on which is built the fortrefs of Or-kapi, or Perekop, to the first rifing of the hill at Karafubafar, the country is one continued flat, elevating itfelf, by an eafy gradation, to the fummit of the hill, which forms the fouth fide of the peninfula, and the fhore of the Euxine Sea. The furface of the foil is almost all of one kind, a reddifh-grey loam; on digging, you find it more or lefs mixed with a black earth, and the hills abound with marle. The whole flat, from Perekop to the river Salgir, which may be an extent of 120 verits, is full of falt-marfhes and lakes, from whence the neighbouring Ruffian governments, as well as the Krim itself, Anatolia, and Bessarabia, are fupplied with falt. The most remarkable of these lakes are five in number: Koflof and Keffa, fo called after the towns near which they lie, are very large; the Tufla, about 15 verfts from Perekop, on the road from Keffa; the Red Lake, not far from the last-mentioned; and the Black Lake. Befides thefe, there VOL. XXVIII.

The greatest part of the peninfula is fo level that a man may travel over the half of it without meeting with a river, or even the fmalleft brook. The inhabitants of the villages, therefore, make a pit in the yard of every house for receiving the rain, or the water that runs from the hills. The whole tract is bare of every kind of tree. Not a bufh or a bramble is to be feen; and the herbage is extremely fcanty. This, however, does not proceed fo much from the unfruitfulnels of the place, as from the vaft herds of cattle which rove, the whole year long, from place to place, by which means all the grafs, in fpring, fummer, or autumn, no fooner appears, through the long drought which fucceeds the rainy feafon, but it is immediately devoured or trodden down. The universal prevalence of this cuftom of keeping cattle to wander up and down, joined to the flothfulnefs of the Tartars, with their inaptitude and averfion to agriculture, is the reafon of the total neglect of that science here. Otherwife, were the land divided into portions, and properly managed, there would be a fufficiency for the cattle, and the reft would be fruitful in corn and grain. By this means alone the Krim would become a fertile country, and no natural defect would be found in oppofition to the welfare of its inhabitants. The truth of this is well known by their neighbours; where, of a hundred Tartars, one perhaps follows hufbandry, who finds it anfiver to fo much profit, that he has not only enough for his own ufe, but wherewith to fell to the ninety-nine. This

This peninfula, which is indeed but a little district, vet, from the many advantages conferred upon it by nature, may be effeemed reculiarly rich, I shall divide into two parts, the hilly country and the flat. The latter, which extends from Perekop to Koilof and the river Bulganak, to Kerafubafar, Keffa, and Yenicali, is frewn here and there with little Tartar villages, maintained by cattle and the produce of the falt-lakes. The highlands, or hilly country, form the fouthern part of the Krim, along the ftraight coaft of the Black Sea, and firetching westward, in a right line from Keffa, to the vicinity of Belbek. Thefe hills are composed of layers of chalk, which, in the headlands and promontories, is foft, but more inland quite hard. The firata of the highest hills are like those of the promontories, and take a direction from north to fouth. These qualities of the itrata prevail not throughout the whole hills, but only in the large and lofty ones, fuch as the two that rife near Karafubafar, and one very high by Achmetfched, which bears the name of Aktau. The other fmaller hills lie fcattered and difperfed, but take the names of the greater ones, to which they feem to belong; as the great ridge of Caucalus does, which extends beyond the Donau, through Bulgaria, and are named Palkans.

The flate of the hilly part of the Krim is taken chiefly from my own obfervations, and the reft I have taken from the friendly communications of others. All agree in this, that nature has favoured thefe highland countries with great advautages, and bleffed them with abundance of all things; a number of fprings that flow from the meuntains form the two confiderable rivers Salgir and Karafu, that run into the Rotten Sea. The former, which takes its rife from a cavern in a high hill near Achmetfched, falls ftraight into the plain below, and waters a great part of the Krim: the other, commencing behind Karafubafar, falls likewife into the plain, and mingles with the Salgir. The many other little rivers and ftreams, which run eaftward, and either join the two forementioned, or fall immediately into the Rotten Sea, I shall not here particularly mention, but obferve, in general, that all the ftreams, for the whole length of the hills, which begin at Keffa, and proceed in a chain of the fame height, flow to the north, or the north-cail, excepting one behind Achmetiched, where the great mountain Aktau is, which falls on the other fide; I mean the river which, rifing on the northern fide of this mountain, flows, as was before obferved, towards the north-east, to the Salgir and the Rotten Sea; as likewife those which fpring on the weitern fide, take their courfe weftward to the Bulganak, and thence ftraight to the Black Sea, which alfo receives all the other little rivers that arife from thefe hills, as the Amma, the Katfcha, the Belbek, the Kafulkioi, &c. &c.

The mountains are well covered with woods, fit for the purpofe of fhip-building, and contain plenty of wild beats. The vallies confift of fine arable land; on the fides of the hills grow corn and vines in great abundance, and the earth is rich in mines. But thefe mountaineers are as carelefs and negligent as the inhabitants of the deferts, flighting all thefe advantages, and, like their their brethren of the low-lands, are fufficiently happy if they are in poffession of a fat sheep and as much bread as ferves them to eat.

About 18 years ago, this peninfula was uncommonly full of inhabitants and wealth. They reckoned at that time at least 1200 villages; but, from the late troubles in the Krim, it has loft more than a third part of its inhabitants; and now, wherever we turn, we meet with the ruins of large villages and dwellings. The people was composed of various nations, who lived to-gether under the Tartars in the most unbounded freedom; but, in the late Turkish war, they either put themfelves under the Ruffian government, and were transferred to that empire, or fled to Abcafia and the Tschirkassian hills.

The houfes in the towns, as well as the villages, are, for the most part, of fquare timbers, having the interffices filled with brick work, if the poffessor can afford it, and those of the poorer fort with turf. The chinks and crannies are made tight with clay, and then plastered within and without. The covering is commonly either of brick or of turfs. Only the medfcheds, minarets, and baths, are of ftone, and a few extremely handfome, of marble. They have chimnies in the chambers, at which they likewife drefs their victuals; but floves in the Ruffian manner none. In extreme frosts a great iron pan of charcoal is brought into the room, for making it comfortable. Their cuftom is, to fit upon low fofas, with Turkish coverings and cushions, or upon a clay feat, fomewhat railed above the earth, and fpread with a carpet. In thefe rooms are cupboards and chefts, often covered with cufhions, to ferve as feats, in which they keep their gold, filver, and valuables. Such are the inner apartments, or harems, in which the women generally live; the others are not to fine. Thefe contain only a fofa, or a bank of clay, covered with a carpet, as in the chimney rooms.

The cloathing of the Tartars is fo well known, that I shall not give myfelf or your readers the trouble of going through its defcription.

The rich Tartars, and their nobility, or murzas (excepting only fuch as are about the perfon of the khan) commonly dwell, all the year round, in the country, coming only to town when they have builders there. There are but few towns in the Krim, at least in comparison or its former population. The Krimfkoi Tartars have no tribunal of juffice, controverties and quarrel. being feldom heard of among them : and if a difpute should arise, it is immediately fettled by an appeal 10 the Koran. Little differences in the villages inevitably happening. about property, or other matters not taken notice of in that code. are amicably adjusted by the eldermen, or abefes; but in the towns all weighty concerns, excepting the fingle cafe of murder or homicide, are brought before the kaimakan, or commandant, who fettles them abfolutely, without appeal.

The refidence of the khans of the Krimea was formerly Bachtichifarai, in which city they held their feat for upwards of 200 years. They went thither from Efki-Krim, or Old Krim, the capital city of the Geneele, upon Bengli Ghireikhan's plandering the fea-ports, and driving all the Genoefe from their ftations. Before Effai-Hrim, and indeed deed upon the first coming of the Tarturs into this peninfula, the fovereign refidence was at Koflof, but here they remained not long. Under the late khan Schagin Ghirei, it was held at Keffa, the ancient Theodolia, which is 15 verifs distant from Efki-Krim, fuid to be the Cimmerium of the ancients.

The principal cities or towns of the Krimea are :

Bachtichi-Sarai, an extensive and wealthy city, lving in a vale between two high mountains, and purrounded by a number of gardens. From this circumstance it has its name ; Bachtfchi fignifying, in the Tartarian language, a garden, and Sarai, a palace. It formerly contained 3000 houfes, and many fumptuous medscheds. The palace of the khans, with its gardens and ponds, were much improved under the government of khan Kerim Girei, under whole government the last Turkish war took its rife. In this palace is the burial place of all the khans of Krimea, wherein all the khans that have reigned here lie interred. The fine Krimskoi vines, with their large clufters of grapes, grow in great plenty all about this town, and a profusion of other delicious fruits, from whence the neighbouring parts of Russia are supplied.

Keffa, the prefent refidence of the khaus, flands on the fhore of a large harbour in the Black Sea. Its fite is on the declivity of a long fidge of mountains, and is mantled by a flone wall, fortified by a deep ditch. On both fides of the city formerly flood caffles, and in the middle of them a lofty turrer, for the purpole of giving fignals by fire. Before the wall were wide extended fuburbs, containing, among other confiderable buildings, medfcheds, churches for the Greek and Armenian worfhip, of all which now only the vettiges remain. The cattles and towers lie alfo in ruins, and not one third part of the houfes of the city itfelf are now remaining, and those chiefly built of materials taken from the aforefaid ruins. They formerly reckoned Keffa to contain 4000 houfes, including the fuburbs, with a number of medscheds and Chriftian churches: but this number has been much diminished by the laft Turkish war.

I perceived in the walls of the houses a great many blocks and flabs of marble, with inferiptions and enfigns armorial, chiffeled in the time of the Genoefe. The prefent inhabitants confift moftly of Tartars, who carry on a trade, by no means inconfiderable, in commodities brought from Turkey. The late khan, an intelligent and enlightened perfonage, made this city the place of his refidence, and brought hither the mint from Bachtschisarai, built himself a palace. and erected a divan, which affer bled three times a week, and the fourth time was held in the palace of the khan, in which he always perfonally affifted. Here is alfo a cuftom-house, the management of which is farmed out.

Karafubafar, likewife a verv rish city in former times, flands at the beginning of the mountains, about half-way between Keffa and Bachtfchifarai. It is a large trading town, contains a confiderable number of dwelling-houfes and medfcheds, but the greateft part of them in decay, and many fine gardens. This place is the moft famous in all the Krim for its trade in horfes, and has a market once a week for that article article of traffic; to which are likewife brought great numbers of buffaloes, oxen, cows, camels, and fheep, for fale. Near this city flows one of the principal rivers of the Krim, called the Karaíu, that is, the Black Water. Of this river they have an opinion in Ruffia, that one part of it flows upwards for feveral verits together. But this is in fome fort true, not only of the Karafu, but of all the rivers of the Krim that have a ftrong current.-The Tartars, who dwell either in the vallies, or on the fides of the mountains, (frequently without confidering whether the place is fupplied with water or not) dig canals either from the fource of the next river, or from that part of it which lies nearest to their particular habitation, about an arfhine in breadth, for their gardens and domestic use. From these they cut smaller ones through the villages, to fupply them with water, and not unfrequently to drive a mill. These canals appear, to the imagination of the common people, to run in a contrary direction to the current of the river; and in fact these canals do lie, in many places, for a verit in length, fome fathoms higher than the level of the flream from whence they are fupplied.

Achmetited, a pretty large city, not far from Bachtschisarai, now made the capital of all the Krimea, by the regulations of prince Potemkin, in the fummer of laft year, Kollof, formerly a very confiderable trading town, lies on the weftern fide of the peninfula, in a bay of the Black Sea, which, as well as the found at Keffa, might rather be called a road than a haven. This was the first town the Tartars poffessed themselves of on their first entrance into the Krim, and effab lished a custom-house therein, afte the example of the Genoefe, which is now farmed out.

The other remarkable places are, Sudak, which is built on the hills upon the fhore of the Black Sea, at the fouth fide of the peninfula, and is famous for its excellent wine, refembling Champaigne, both in colour and ftrength ; Alufchti, on the fame fide, among the hills on the fea-fhore; Baluklava, where there is a fine harbour, and perhaps the only one on the Black Sea, containing ample room for a very good fleet; Inkerman may be noticed for its commodious, though not very large, haven, called Achtiar: and Mangup, the old Cherfonefus; which were all formerly very flourishing towns, but are now either in ruins, or dwindled into fmall villages.

All these places, so long as the Genoese remained masters of the Krim, were well fortified; but the Tartars, in taking them, demolithed all the works. While they were under the 'Turks, they left the fortreffes of Keffa, Kertich, and Koflof, and built the fort Arabat, on the neck of land between the fea of Azof (or Palus Mæotis) and the Rotten Sea, where Perekop alfo is.

In Arabat are but few houfes; but here the warlike flores of the khans were kept .- Perekop, called by the Turks Or-kapi, is a fortreis of moderate ftrength, ftanding about the middle of the neck of land that joins the peninfula with the continent. This inthmus, which is at least nine versts broad, is cut through with a wide and deep ditch, lined with stone, and reaches from the Black to the Rotten Sea. 'T hiswas formerly kept without water, but now it is filled from both feas. On the the Krimean fide a high wall of earth runs the whole length of it, ftraight from one fea to the other .---You-pais over the ditch by means of a drawbridge, and through the wall by a gateway. The walls of the fortress are some fathom from the road-fide, of which the ruins are only now differnible, namely, large brick houfes, with a number of bomb-shells and cannon-balls about them, which were formerly kept in the fortrefs. At leaft three verifs from this is the pretty popuious, but miferable, place which was probably the town to which this fort belonged. Near the gate is a cuftom-houfe. where all imports and exports pay duty.

This peninfula was formerly extremely populous; the number of its inhabitants, in Tartars, Turks, Greeks, Armenians, Jews, and others, amounted to above 200,000 men. Since that, however, the greatest part of the Christians have betaken themfelves to the other parts of the Russian empire, particularly the government of Azof; and many other inhabitants, particularly Tartars, have gone to Taman and Abchafia; fo that the prefect population of the Krim cannot now be reckoned at more than 50,000 men at moft.

The Krim was heretofore divided into 24 kaduliks, or diffricts, namely, Yenikali, Kertfch, Arabat, Efki-krim, Keffa, Karafubafar, Sudak, Achmetfched, Yalof, Bachtfchifarai, Balaklava, Mangup, Inkerman, K nfof, Or, Manfur, Tarkan, Siva.ch, Tfchongar, Sarubulat, Barun, Argun, Sidfchugut, and Schirin. Several of thefe diffricts are named after the town or village wherein the murza, their governor, dwells; and many of them are at prefent in a flate of total, decay."

TACITURNITY, an Apologue, tranflated from the French of Abbé Blanchet; extracted from Tales, Romances, Apologues, Sc. from the French, in two vols.

A T Amadan was a celebrated academy, the first statute of which ran thus:

The academicians are to think much, write little, and, if possible, speak lefs.

This was called the Silent Academy, nor was there a fage, in Perfia, who was not ambitious of being admitted a member. Zeb, a famous fage, and author of an excellent little book, entitled, The Gag, heard, in the diftant province where he lived, there was a vacancy in the filent academy. Immediately he departed for Amadan, and, arriving, prefented himfelf at the door of the hall where the academicians were affembled, and fent in the following billet to the prefident:

Zeb, a lover of filence, humbly afks the vacant place.

The billet arrived too late, the vacancy was already fupplied. The academicians were almost in defpair; they had received, fomewhat against their inclinations, a courtier, who had fome wit, and whofe light and triffing eloquence had become the admiration of all his court-acquaintances; and this learned body was now reduced to the neceflity of refusing the Sage Zeb, the fcourge of bablers, the perfection of wifdom.

The prefident, whofe duty it was to announce this difagreeable news to the Sage, fcarcely could refolve, nor knew in which manner belt, to perform his office. After a moment's reflection he ordered a flagon to be filled with water, and fo full that another drop would have made the water run over. He then defired them to introduce the candidate.

The Sage appeared, with that fimple and modeft air which generally accompanies true merit. The prefident rofe, and, without fpeaking a word, pointed, with affliction in his looks, to the emblematical flagon fo exactly full.

The Sage understood from thence the vacancy was fupplied, but, without relinquishing hope, he endeavoured to make them comprehend that a fupernumerary member might, perhaps, be no detriment to their fociety. He faw on the floor a rofe-leaf, picked it up, and with mere and delicacy placed it on the furface of the water, fo as not to make it overflow.

All the academicians immediately clapped their hands, betokening applaufe, when they beheld this ingenious reply. They did more, they broke through their rules in favour of the Sage Zeb. The regifler of the academy was prefented him, and he inferibed his name.-Nothing remained but for him to pronounce, according to cuftom, a fingle phrafe of thanks. But this new, and truly filent, academician, returned thanks without fpeaking a word.

In the margin of the register he wrote the number one hundred (that of his brethren) then put a cypher before the figures, under which he wrote thus :

0100

Their value is neither more nor lefs.

1100

POETRY.

ODE for the NEW YEAR, 1786.

I.

DEAR to Jove, a genial ifie,
Crowns the broad Atlantic wave;
The feafons there in mild affemblage fmile,
And vernal bloffoms clothe the fruitful prime:
There, in many a fragrant cave,
Dwell the Spirits of the brave,
And braid with amaranth their brows fublime."
So feign'd the Grecian bards, of yore;
And veil'd in Fable's fancy-woven veft
A vifionary fhore,
That faintly gleam'd on their prophetic eye

Through the dark volume of futurity : Nor knew that in the bright attire they dreft Albion, the green-hair'd heroine of the Weft :

II.

Vainly flow'd the myfic rhime ! Mark the deeds from age to age,

That fill her trophy-pictur'd page :

And fee, with all its ftrength, untam'd by time, Still glows her valour's veteran rage,

O'er Calpe's cliffs, and fleepy towers,

When fiream'd the red fulphureous flowers,

And Death's own hand the dread artillery threw ;

How triumph'd Eliott's patient train,

Baffling

Baffling their vain confederate foes ! And met the unwonted fight's terrific form ; And hurling back the burning war, arole Superior to the fiery florm !

Is there an ocean, that forgets to roll Beneath the torpid pole?

Nor to the brooding tempeft heaves? Her hardy keel the flubborn billow cleaves. The rugged Neptune of the wintry brine In vain his adamantine breaft-plate wears:

To fearch coy Nature's guarded mine, She burfts the barriers of th' indignant ice; O'er funlefs bays the beam of Science bears: And rouzing far around the polar fleep,

Where Drake's bold enfigns fear'd to fweep, She fees new nations flock to fome fell facrifice. She fpeeds, at George's fage command,

And zone to zone fhe binds; From fhore to fhore, o'er every land, The golden chain of commerce winds.

IV.

Mean-time, her patriot-cares explore Her own rich woof's exhauftlefs flore; Her native fleece new fervour feels, And wakens all its whirling wheels,

And mocks the rainbow's radiant dye ; More wide the labours of the loom fhe fpreads, In firmer bands domeftic commerce weds, And calls her Sifter-ifle to fhare the tie :

Nor heeds the violence that broke From filial realms her old parental yoke !

Her cities, throng'd with many an Attic dome, Afk not the banner'd baftion, maffy-proof;

Firm as the caffle's feudal roof,

Stands the Briton's focial home.— Hear, Gaul, of England's liberty the lot !— Right, Order, Law, protect her fimplest plain; Nor fcorn to guard the shepherd's nightly fold,

And watch around the forest cot.

With confcious certainty, the fwain Gives to the ground his truffed grain,

With eager hope the reddening harveft eyes ; And claims the ripe autumnal gold,

The mead of toil, of industry the prize.

For our's the King, who boafts a parent's praife, Whofe hand the people's fceptre fways ; Ours is the Senate, not a specious name, Whofe active plans pervade the civil frame : Where bold debate its nobleft war difplays, And, in the kindling strife, unlocks the tide Of manliest eloquence, and rolls the torrent wide.

VI.

Hence then, each vain complaint, away, Each captious doubt, and cautious fear ! Nor blaft the new-born year,

'That anxious waits the fpring's flow-fhooting ray : Nor deem that Albion's honours ceafe to bloom. With candid glance, th' impartial Mufe

Invok'd on this auspicious morn,

The present scans, the distant scene pursues, And breaks Opinion's speculative gloom : Interpreter of ages yet unborn, Full right the fpells the characters of Fate,

That Albion still shall keep her wonted state ! Still, in eternal flory, fhine,

Of Victory the fea-beat fhrine;

The fource of every fplendid art,

Of old, of future worlds the universal mart.

THEN Freedom nurs'd her native fire In ancient Greece, and rul'd the lyre; Her bards, difdainful, from the tyrant's brow The tinfel gifts of flattery tore;

But paid to guiltlefs power their willing vow : And to the throne of virtuous kings,

Tempering the tone of their vindictive ftrings,

The fragrant wreath of gratulation bore.

'Twas thus Alceus fmote the manly chord ;

And Pindar on the Perfian lord

His notes of indignation hurl'd,

And fpurn'd the minstrel flaves of eastern fway,

From trembling Thebes extorting confcious shame ;

But o'er the diadem, by Freedom's flame Illum'd, the banner of renown unfurl'd : Thus to his Hiero decreed, 'Mongft the bold chieftains of the Pythian game, The brighteft verdure of Caftalia's bay; And gave an ampler meed Of Pifan palms, than in the field of Fame Were wont to crown the car's victorious fpeed : And hail'd his fcepter'd champion's patriot zeal, Who mix'd the monarch's with the people's weal; From civil plans who claim'd applaufe, And train'd obedient realms to Spartan laws. III. And He, fweet mafter of the Doric oat, Theocritus, forfook awhile The graces of his pastoral isle, The lowing vale, the bleating cote, The cluffers on the funny fleep, And Pan's own umbrage, dark and deep, The caverns hung with ivy-twine, The cliffs that wav'd with oak and pine, And Etna's hoar romantic pile : And caught the bold Homeric note, In flately founds exalting high The reign of bounteous Ptolemy : Like the plenty-teeming tide Of his own Nile's redundant flood, O'er the cheer'd nations, far and wide, Diffufing opulence, and public good : While in the richly-warbled lays Was blended Berenice's name, Pattern fair of female fame, Softening with domestic life Imperial splendour's dazzling rays, The queen, the mother, and the wife !

PROLOGUE to the HEIRESS.

Written by the Right How. RICHARD FITZPATRICK.

Spoken by Mr. KING.

S fprightly fun-beams gild the face of day, When low'ring tempefts calmly glide away, So when the poet's dark horizon clears, Array'd in finiles, the Epilogue appears. She of that houfe the lively emblem fill, Whofe brilliant fpeakers flart what themes they will; Still varying topics for her fportive rhymes, From all the follies of thefe fruitful times; Unc. eck'd by forms, with flippant hand may cull: Prologues, like Peers, by privilege are dull. In folemn frain addrefs th' affembled pit, The legal judges of dramatic wit, Confining fill, with dignify'd decorum, Their obfervations—to the play before 'em.

Now when each batchelor a helpmate lacks, (That fweet exemption from a double tax) When laws are fram'd with a benignant plan . Of light'ning burdens on the married man, And Hymen adds one folid comfort more, To all those comforts, he conferred before ; To fmooth the rough laborious road to fame, Our Bard has chosen -an elluring name. As wealth in wedlock oft is known to hide The imperfections of a homely bride, This tempting title, he perhaps expects, May heighten beauties-and conceal defects : Thus fixty's wrinkles view'd through Fortune's glafs, The rofy dimples of fixteen furpais: The modern fuitor grafps his fair-one's hand, O'erlooks her perfon, and adores-ber land; Leers on her houles with an ogling eye, O'er her rich acres heaves an am'rous figh. His beartfelt pangs through groves of-timber vents, And runs distracted for-ber three per cents.

Will thus the poet's mimic Heirefs find The bridegroom critic to her failings blind, Who claims, alas ! his nicer tafte to hit, The lady's portion paid in flerling wit ? On your decrees, to fix her future fate, Depends our Heirefs for her whole effate : Rich in your fimiles, the charms th' admiring town; A very bankrupt, thould you chance to frown : O may a verdict, giv'n in your applaufe, Pronounce the profp'rous iffue of her caufe, Confirm the name an anxious parent gave her, And prove her HEIRESS of—the public favour ?

A PATHETIC APOLOGY for all LAUREATS, paft, prefeat, and to come.

Veniant ad Cafaris Aures!

Why will ye firive to be fevere? In pity to yourfelves forbear; Nor let the fneering public fee What numbers write far worfe than he.

While every tadpole of the lake Lay quiet, tho' they felt it quake, They knew their nature's due degree, Themfelves fcarce more alive than he; They knew they could not croak like frogs, --Why will you try ?--ye filly dogs !

When the poor barber felt afkance The thunder of a Quixote's lance, For merely bearing on his head Th' expressive emblem of his trade, The barber was a harmlefs log, The hero was the filly dog— What trivial things are caufe of quarrel ! Mambrino's helmet, or the laurel, Alike diffract an ideot's brain,

And that too tax'd, and but ill paid, With caution frames his frugal plan,

Then " ponder well, ye parents dear" Of works, which live a whole half year; And with a tender eye furvey The frailer offspring of a day, Whofe glories wither ere they bloom, Whofe very cradle is their tomb :

Have ye no bowels, cruel men ! You who may grafp, or quit the pen, May chufe your fubject, nay, your time, When genius prompts to fport in rhyme Dependant on yourfelves alone, To be immortal, or unknown : Does no compafion touch your breaft For brethren to the fervice preft? ACCOUNT

ACCOUNT of BOOKS for 1786.

The History of Ancient Greece, its Colonies, and Conquests, from the earliest Accounts till the Division of the Macedonian Empire in the East; including the History of Literature, Philosophy, and the Fine Arts, in 2 vols. By John Gillies, LL. D.

T is with pleafure we behold every attempt which tends to illustrate and record the annals of that country, in which the human mind first attained that degree of maturity and perfection which fucceeding ages have always found it difficult to maintain, and which they have certainly never furpassed.

The main defign of the work before us, as the author informs us in the preface to it, is confined to the space of feven centuries, which elapfed from the fettlement of the Greeks in Afia Minor until the establishment of the Macedonian empire in the East. But previous to the commencement of that period, he has in the two first chapters, and in the beginning of the third, exhibited a view of the progrefs of civilization and power in Greece, preceding the Trojan war -he has given a history of that war -of its confequences-of the religion, government, arts, manners, and character of the Greeks during those ages-of their distracted state after the taking of Troy—and of the fettlement of the Dorians in Peloponnefus under the conduct of the Heracleidæ.

Through the darkness and obseurity of this part of the Grecian hiftory, Dr. Gillies marches with great confidence and boldness. He has endeavoured by reafon and conjecture, fometimes perhaps fuccefsfully, to unite the clue where it was broken, and to make it more obvious where it was concealed. The narrative is well conducted, and not uninterefting, particularly to those who may be unacquainted with the fources from which he has drawn it. The learned, it is likely, will expect fome more abstruse and elaborate refearches into the antiquities of Greece, and some sources of information disclosed which were hitherto known only to the few. The materials themfelves it certainly required no very extraordinary compafs of learning, or minutenefs of investigation, to discover; but the disposition and arrangement of those materials are well conceived, and (excepting a few inftances of unwarrantable phrafeology, proceeding, as it should feem, from an illjudged ambition to aggrandize by oftentatious language the moft common ideas) the execution in general is not unworthy of the fubject. But of this we shall have occasion tG to fpeak more at large when we come to fum up the aggregate merit of the work. In proof of what we have in this place advanced refpecting it, we fhall lay before our readers a few fpecimens from the part which has already paffed under review.

Of the happy effects produced on the manners of the Greeks by the Argonautic expedition, the author thus fpeaks :

" Notwithstanding many romantic fictions that disfigure the flory of the Argonauts, their undertaking appears to have been attended with a confiderable and a happy effect on the manners and character of the Greeks. From the æra of this celebrated expedition, we may difcover not only a more daring and more enlarged fpirit of enterprize, but a more decifive and rapid progrefs towards civilization and humanity. The fullen and unfociable chiefs, whole acquaintance with each other most commonly arofe from acts of mutual hostility, hitherto gave full fcope to the fanguinary paffions which characterize barbarians. Strength and courage were almost the only qualities which they admired : they fought and plundered at the head of their refpective tribes, while the inhabitants of the neighbouring diffici were regarded only as fit objects of excite their rage, and gratin to derapacity. But thele gloonly war riors, having exerted their joint valour in a remote expedition, learn ed the necessity of acquiring mor. amiable virtues, as well as of adopting more liberal notions of the public interest, if they pretended to deferve the effeent of their equals. Military courage and address might alone procure them the respect of their immediate followers, fince the fafety of the little community often depended on the warlike abilities of the chieftain; but when feveral tribes had combined in a common enterprize, there was lefs dependance on the prowels of any fingle leader. Emulation and interest rendered all these leaders as jealous of each other as defarous of the public applaufe; and in order to acquire this applaufe, it was necclilary to brighten the luftre of martial fipirit by the more valuable virtues of juftice and humanity."

At the concluion of the fecond chapter, the author, having before taken a general review of the Grecian manners and character, has drawn up an effinate of their value, as compared with the rude callons of javage life, and the artificial refinements of polithed jointy. We here prefent it to the reader, as affording no bad specimen of the author's turn of mind and opinion, as well as manner of writing.

"The Greeks," fays he, " had advanced beyond that uniform infipidity of deportment, that fullen ferocity of manners, and that harderea inferrouting of heart, which a meeting manacterize the fayage meet. They shill poffelled, however, that patient intropidity, that oble foirit of independence, that arient attachment to their friends, a that generous contempt of pain to danger, and death, which render the defeription of the wild tribes of America fo interesting to a philosophie mind. Of two principal enjoyments of life, fludy and convertation, they were little acquainted, indeed, with the consolations and pleasure of the first, the want of which was compensated by the funcerity, the constance, the charms of

of the fecond. Their focial affections were less comprehensive in their objects, but more powerful in their effects, than those of more po-Lifhed nations. A generous chief zushes to certain death, to revenge the caufe of his friend ; yet refufes to the pravers of an aged parent the melancholy confolation of interring the remains of his favourite fon; till the corresponding image of his own father ftrikes his mind, and at once melts him to pity. The imaginary wants and artificial paffions which are fo neceffary to urge the hand of industry, and to vary the purfuits of men, in improved commercial focieties, were Jupplied to the Greeks by that exceffive fenfibility, which interefted them to deeply in the affairs of their community, their tribe, their family, and their friends; and which even connected them by the feelings of gratitude with the inanimate objects of nature. As they were not acquainted with the fame diverfity of employments, fo ncither were they fatigued with the fame giddy round of diffipated pleafures which augment the fplendid mifery of later times. Though ignorant of innumerable arts which adorn the prefent age, they had difcovered one of ineffimable value, to render the great duties of life its most entertaining amusement. It will not, perhaps, be eafy to point out a nation who united a more complete fubordination to established authority with a higher fenfe of perfonal independence ; and a more respectful regard to the dictates of religion with a more ardent fpirit of martial enterprize. The gene. rous equality of their political eftablishments, and their imagined intercourfe with the gods, confpired to raife them to a certain elevation of character which will be for ever remembered and admired. This character was rendered permanent in Sparta by the famous laws commonly aferibed to the invention of Lycurgus, but which, as will appear in the fubfequent chapter, were almost exact copies of the cuftoms and inflitutions that univerfally prevailed in Greece during the heroic ages."

In the passages above quoted the reader will perceive an accuracy of thinking which befpeaks the author a man who has fludied human life with no fmall diligence, and poffeffing a mind that has been much employed in the exercise of its reflective powers. The condition of man, in the infancy and in the old age of fociety, is flated with precision, and the limits are determined where barbarism ends, and where refinement begins to degenerate into vice.

The migrations which took place among the Hellenic tribes, occupy great part of the next chapter: after which the author proceeds to the main fubject. It is neither our defign nor our bufinefs to follow him through every part of the work: that were to write a commentary on it, not to give a general effimate of its value, which, we conceive, more properly belongs to our province.

In forming our judgment of the proper flyle of hilfory, it feems an obvious confideration, that, as the materials about which it is employed differ from each other in all the degrees of great and little, light and important, common and extraordinary, its tone, if we may fo fay, fhould be varied in fuch a manner as beit to accord with the nature of the circumflance : and and that, therefore, it should occafionally affame all the corresponding varieties of high and low, loud and foft, plain and magnificent. The pretentions of our hillorian, confidered under this important article of merit, we are forry to obferve, have the least claim to our approbation; though, if we may judge from the pains he has beitowed, it feems to have been a principal object of his ambition to fucceed in it. But thus in other inflances it happens, that the child of our warmeit affection most frequently difappoints our hopes. Who can without regret behold the author, in many parts of his work, anxioufly ftraining the whole power of his eloquence, where a bare, unadorned recital only is required; and again, when the fubject, by its real importance, demands a fuitable dignity and eminence of ftyle, betraying his exhausted strength, and degenerating by a natural progrefs into the extreme of puerility and emptinefs? But lest we should appear fevere or unjust in our cenfure, we felect as our authority the following passages, from many others of a fimilar character to be met with in the course of the work.

"The troops marched out under cover of the night, and in the fame order which they had hitherto obferved. But they had not proceeded far in this nocturnal expedition, when the obfeurity of the fkies, the deceitful tracks of an unknown and hoftile country, filled the htoft timid or unfortunate with imaginary terrors. Their panic, as is ufual in great bodies of men, was fpeedily communicated to thofe around them; and Demofthenes, with above one half of his division, fatally mistook the road, and quitted, never more to rejoin, the rest of the army."

The incident, every one fees, is natural and common enough: but who will fay that the relation of it is fo? Such a pompous affemblage of epithets, and the pathetic anticipation of Demofihenes's fate, would have better fuited the mock dignity of romance.

Imagination can fcarcely form to itfelf a fcene of more dreadful affliction than that which the Athenian army prefented in its retreat from the camp before Syracufe. But let us fee how it is exhibited by the pencil of our hiltorian.

" They had abandoned their fleet, their transports, the hopes of victory, and the glory of the Athenian name; and thefe collective fufferings were enhanced and exasperated by the painful images which ftruck the eyes and the fance of each unfortunate individual. The mangled bodies of their companions and friends, deprived of the facred rites of funeral, affected them with a fentiment of religious horror, on which the weaknefs of human nature is happily unable to d.vell. They removed their attention from this dreadful fight; but they could not divert their compaffion from a fpectacle still more melancholy, the numerous crowds of fick and wounded who followed them with enfeebled and unequal fteps, intreating, in the accent and attitude of unutterable anguish, to be delivered from the horrors of famine, or the rage of an exasperated foe. Amidit fuch affecting fcenes, the heart of a ftranger would have melted with tender fympathy; but but how much more muft it have affected the Athenians, to fee their parents, brothers, children, and friends, involved in unexampled milery! to hear, without the poffibility of relieving, their lamentable complaints! and reluctantly to throw the chinging victims from their wearied necks and arms !"

Let the ingenuous reader confult his own feelings, and honefly tell us, whether, in the above defoription, an idea of the author himfelf does not frequently interpole itfelf between his compafion and the proper objects of it.

But while we cenfure the execution of particular parts, we do not mean that our objection should be extended to the whole of the performance. We could have wifhed, indeed, that the ftyle, confidered in its general character, had been more chaite, and lefs laboured; that the author bad been lefs folicitous to recommend the matter by his eloquence, than his eloquence by the matter ;---making that which in its own nature is of but fecondary confideration (being intended only as the vehicle of pleafure) fubfervient to the higher purposes of the latter, whofe main end is utility.

That the defect above remarked does not generally prevail throughout the work, every one who reads it will eafily be convinced. Many are the paflages that might be produced, of which good writing appears to be not the least merit. We will inflance only in one or two; the limits of our plan uct permitting us to indulge any further the wifh to do juffice as well to the merits as the faults of our historian. The account given in the 32d chapter, of Plato's Cosmogony, cannot but be highly acceptable to every man of true tafte, as well as to the feholar. For the perufal of fuch it is here fubjoined.

" Impelled by his goodnefs, the Deity, viewing in his own intellect the ideas or archetypes of all poffible existence, formed the beautiful arrangement of the universe from that rude indigested matter, which, exifting from all eternity, had been for ever animated by an irregular principle of motion. This principle, which Plato calls the irrational foul of the world, he thought fufficiently atteffed in the innumerable deviations from the established laws of nature, in the extravagant paillons of men, and in the phylical and moral, which, in confequence of thefe deviations and paffions, fo visibly prevail in the world. Without admitting a certain stubborn intractability, and diforderly wildnefs, effential to matter, and therefore incapable of being entirely eradicated or fabdued, it feemed impoffible to explain the origin of evil under the government of the Deity."

In the next paragraph the author proceeds to explain the doctrine of ideas; which we fhall transcribe for the fame reason as we did the former.

" From these rude materials, (fays he) God, according to the fanciful doctrine of Plato, formed the four elements, and built the beautiful structure of the heavens and the earth, after the models of thofe external examplars, or patterns, which fubfift in the divine Intelligence. Confidering that beings possessed of mental powers were far preferable to those deflitute of fuch faculties, God infused into the corporeal world a rational foul, which, as it could be immediately combined with body, he united to the active, tive, but irrational principle, effentially inherent in matter. Having thus formed and animated the earth, • the fun, the moon, and the other vifible divinities, the great Father of fpirits proceeded to create the invisible gods and damons, whose nature and history Plato deferibes with a refpectful reverence for the religion of his country. After finithing this great work, the God of Gods again contemplating the ideal forms in his own mind, perceived there the exemplars of three fpecies of beings, which he realized in the mortal inhabitants of the earth, air, and water. The tafk of forming these sensible, but irrational beings, he committed to the inferior divinities; becaufe, had this last work likewife proceeded from his own hands, it must have been im-The fouls mortal like the gods. of men, on the other hand, he himfelf formed from the remainder of the rational foul of the world. They first existed in the state of damons, only invefted with a thin æthereal body. Having offended God by neglecting their duty, they were condemned to unite with the grofs corporeal mafs, by which their divine faculties are fo much clogged and encumbered."

Had our author always written thus, it had been vain to blame, (fuch are the words of a great critic and philosopher on a fimilar occafion) and ufelefs to praife him. Here we behold grace and ftrength united : the understanding and the fancy receive each its proper gratification.

Upon the whole, then, the work before us, on a fair and accurate furvey, will be found to posses a very confiderable fhare of merit. It -contains much useful information both for the scholar and the parent. What we deem most generally exceptionable in it is the ftyle, of which we have already fpoken. The order of time and of facts are as well preferved as their nature will admit. In the obfcurity attending remote periods and early teftimony, much will necessarily be left to the penetration and ingenuity of the historian : and it will not be denied that, in this part of his tafk. Dr. Gillies has in fome degree improved upon the labours of his predeceffors. The feries of events proceeds in orderly fucceffion; nor is the main fubject fo crouded with incidents as to diffipate the reader's attention by prefenting to it at one time too great a variety of objects ; every figure, as it were, of the piece being placed at fuch a diffance as to appear in itfelf a perfect one, at the fame time not diminishing, but aiding and heightening the effect of the whole. The hiftorical accourt of letters and philosophy, judiciouily interposed at proper intervals throughout the work, must needs render it doubly valuable.

An account of State Papers, colleacd by Edward Earl of Clarendon, Vol. III. felio.

COON after the unfortunate end 👸 of Charles the first, Charles the fecond, together with fuch of the late king's counfellors as followed the fortunes of the fon, rendezvoufed at the Hague.

Amongst the different measures here adopted for the fupport of that forlorn condition, which they found themfelves reduced to, it was refolyed, in the beginning of the year 1649, that the lord Cottington and Sir Sir Edward Hyde thould be fent anbaffadors to Madrid, to promote their mafter's intereft at that court.

The volume of itate papers now before us commences at this period, and finishes with the recognition of parliament in favour of Charles the fecond, in May 1660. It contains a regular and almost uninterrupted feries of the proceedings, councils, views, and prospects of Charles the fecond, his followers and adherents, from the time of his quitting England to his reftoration-a period in which the abilities, judgment, and policy of many of those who figured in it, are more to be weighed and confidered than the apparent magnitude or consequence of their operations. Their fphere of action was confined and limited, and to enlarge it required certain extraordinary and unforeseen events to co-operate with and affift great management and exertion. They had to combat with the folly and levity of fome of their own affociates, and dexteroufly to comply with the fhifting interefts and policy of almost all the states in Europe. It was by confenting to become the temporary inftruments of alm. ft every court, to be taken up or laid down as occasion ferved, that they procured to themfelves a precarious existence. But to exist was every thing, where fo much was to be left to events and contingencies, which they neither could forefee nor controul.

The firft feries of letters are from fir Edward Hyde to Mr. fecre ary Nicholas. These letters are quite of a confidential nature, written by one friend to another, where the most unreferved communication of the writers thoughts and opinions, refpecting the flate of their affairs, and respecting the characters of nis affociates, and of almost all those with whom he acted, seems to have taken place. The period they comprise is from the year 1649 to 1654 inclusive.

During the greateft part of this time, Charles the fecond refided at the court of France, and the then fubfifting hoftilities between Cromwell and that kingdom created a precarious afylum for the fugitive monarch. But the poverty and diftrefs of himfelf and affociates, even at this juncture, cannot better be conceived than from the following letter from fir Edward Hyde to fecretary Nicholas, dated from Paris 27th June 1653, which we fhall beg leave to lay before our readers.

Sir Edward Hyde to Sccretary Nicholas.

Dear Mr. Secretary,

" I HAVE your 29th of the 10th of this month, and I thank you for the copy of the Spanish ambaffador's meinoir. I believe that peace will not hold long, and that the rebels of England have promifed the Spaniard notable affiftance towards the fetting that war on foot again; and we shall now fee, upon the fuccels of their late encounter, what their purpose is, and whether all this fuite and noise about the money at London hath been by collufion; for if now they are mafters at fea, they shall transport men to Bourdeaux, as some men imagine they will, then hath that money been from the beginning defigued to that purpose, and I find this people here are very scalous of their friendship. I do not fo much apprehend a peace between between the rebels and the Dutch upon a treaty with their deputies whom they are now fending, as that the English may affist that party in Holland, which they depend upon to compel the other provinces to do as they require, for there is no queftion they will require fuch conditions as must absolutely destroy the liberty of that people, and make them fubordinate to the other. The princefs royal hath written to the king that the will ftay at Bruffels till fhe receives his next letter, and if he continue his defire, that fhe will return to Breda, fo that it is not yet impoffible but that very unfeafonable and indeed ridiculous journey may be yet diverted. I have fome little reafon to imagine that the princefs doth intend to do juffice in the cafe of Monf. Somerdyke, but it breaks my heart to fee how negligent she is of old friends. The king writ to her for a place for the ion of Borcel, who waits upon the prince of Orange, but the hath beflowed it upon another, which exceedingly troubles Boreel, who every day deferves as much from the king as is poffible. If any thing you hear from others of the plenty and bravery of our court makes imprefion upon you, I have no credit with you; I am fure the penury is not to be imagined by you. It is very true, I do not know that any man is yet dead for want of bread, which really I wonder at; I am fure the king himfelf owes for all he hath eaten fince April, and I am not acquainted with one fervant of his who hath a piftole in his pocket; five or fix of us eat together one meal a day for a pistole a week, but all of us owe for God knows how many weeks to the poor woman that feeds us. -1 believe my lord of Ormond hath not Vol. XXVIII.

had five livres in his purfe this month, and hath fewer clothes of all forts than you have, and yet I take you to be no gallant. If two or three (I do not think there are fo many) are without visible want, 1 am fure they are not fuppiled by our mafter, and therefore there is great cruelty and ill-nature in our friends in England in making those excuses for their not doing what they ought to do: they would with much grudging bear the wants and necessities which the beft here are compelled to undergo; and therefore if they will not relieve us, they should not flander and traduce us. 1 believe we are bad enough, but fure we are made much worfe than we are, and they who are at eafe too much enquire into our faults, that they may excuse themselves for want of compailion of our misfortunes, and their cenforioufnets and ill-nature will in the end drive all those from the court who are fitteft to live in it, for few can fubmit to necessities and reproaches at once. * * * * * T have faid all I can in my late letters, upon the remove of the king from this place, and therefore shall ald no more, but that, let us speak of it as much as we can, and I hope ferioufly, it will be I doubt more than a month before we can be ready for it, then our necessities and beggary will be manifest when we are to go; and for the advancement of that fervice, the cardinal now favs he can furnish but half the sum of money he hath even promited the king fhould be ready at 24 hours waraing; to that you need not fear we shall make too much hafte, yet I hope we shall be going shortly, and I doubt not many letters from hence will inform the correspondents that we shall begin our journey in ten day:.

days. The truth is, they who will conclude our remove unseasonable, ought as well to underftand the difficulties and inconveniences of our ftay, which are not to be undervalued. I hope you advife your friends in England to treat the Dutch deputies with that respect which they thewed to their ambaffadors at the Hague, and to demand fuch high conditions as may make the Dutch fenfible of their overfight when they first prefumed to contend with them; and traly if the noble English take lefs than the old cautionary towns, they are to blame, and exact treble damages for the injuries they have fustained. Since they are refolved to fend, I with their deputies were gone, that they and we might know the worft that is to follow. Since I writ to you concerning your intelligencer, the king himfelf hath writ to one he trufts, to know what money he can pay upon order, and as foon as any return comes fuch direction shall be fent as you require; in the mean time you must let Mr. Neville know that the king takes himfelf beholden to him for a good fervice he did him not long fince, and that he looks upon him as a true 🔹 🔹 🔹 🍨 My laft to you friend. brought you all that dispatch to Denmark which you wifned for. I do now begin to wonder that we hear not from our good lord Wentworth ; indeed I hope for fome fruit from that court, which is deeply engaged. I hear indeed that my wife hath ventured a journey to Breda to kifs the princefs royal's hand, but I cannot imagine that fhe intends to visit the Hague; if she does, it will be for love of you, and I shall grow jealous. And fo I have gone through yours, and have very little to add, not having any kind of measure to judge by of the purpoles of this court, which feems to be repoffeffed of their old power, though they ufe it with more wariness and modefly than before it met with any checks. Our master went yesterday to St. Germains, and on Monday that court comes hither, to be prefent the next day at a magnificent entertainment at the Hotel de Ville, in vindication of the fedition which was acted there on the fame day the laft year. Why may not you and I live to be prefent at the fame folemnities at the Guild-hall and Merchant Taylor's-hall ? Truft me, if the fault be not in ourfelves, we shall fee that bleffed day. I have just now a letter from London that affures me, if the deputies come thither from your states, they shall be treated as their ambaffadors were at the Hague : That they will have cautionary towns, and that the Dutch shall no more have ships of war at fea, but shall drive their trade under the protection of their fleets in all feas: it is a good temper, and I hope it will be kept up. God fend us a good meeting, nothing che will keep up the spirits of

Towards the clofe of the year 1654, the treaty concluded between Cromwell and France made it neccffary for the king and his council to quit that kingdom, which they accordingly did, and took up their refidence in the Auftrian Flanders. The letters, at this period, from Sir Edward Hyde, the marquis of Ormond, lord Briftol, and from feveral others of the king's council and followers, relate relate chiefly to the treaty which Charles the Second now fet on foot with Spain; the main object of which, as far as it concerned him, was, " that the Spaniards should affiit him with a body of troops, to be landed on fuch part of the coaft of England as should be deemed most proper, and which was then to cooperate with his majesty's adherents in England and Scotland."

The different negotiations carried on with the Spanish ministers to forward and put this project in motion, form a confiderable part of the letters from the year 1654 to 1658.

All attempts however of this nature proved abortive; and the Spaniards found themfelves too deeply engaged in their war againft France, affilted by the protector Cromwell, to grant any effectual aid to the caufe which they had efpoufed.

Nothing can be conceived more fallen, more degraded, or more irretrievable, than the affairs of Charles the Second at this juncture. The Spanish army retiring on all fides before the marshal Turenne, made a peace for them on any terms abfolutely necessary. The English were in poffession of Dunkirk, and their alliance at that moment of fuch confequence to France, as enabled them to dictate, through the medium of that court, the terms upon which fuch a peace should be granted. Under fuch circumitances it is not fuppofing too much to conclude, that the first preliminary step towards an accommodation would be, that Spain should renounce and deliver up the royal fugitive. The letter from the earl of Briftol to the king, during this desperate state of his affairs, we shall infert here.

The Earl of Briftol to the King.

• * • • " OUR army is retired behind the canal that goes from hence to Dixmude; but what the enemy's next defign will be is not more than gueffed at; fome think they will first take Furnes, then push us farther back, and poffels themfelves of Dixmude, and afterwards attack Ypres; others believe they will take fome other places upon the Lis, and others (I think as probable as any) that La Ferte will inveft Cambray, or fome confiderable place of Hainault, and then this army fall thither, leaving the English to make the war on this fide, who are in fo full possefion of Dunkirk, that it is confidently affured, that they refuled to admit Mr. de Turenne with more than fix or eight perfons of his fuite : it is as true, and methinks as strange, that Mardike is altogether remitted into the French hands. In fine, Sir, they have but to pick and chufe, for we have little to oppose which way foever they turn their de-Thus much for news; as for fign. those things wherewith I am encharged, your majefty will find the account of them in this inclosed to my lord chancellor, who would be too angry with me if I did not write to him a long letter, and indeed I am in too much pain to be able (having no fecretary with me) to write at large of the fame things both to your majefty and him, and of the two I prefume more upon your good nature than upon his. I fhall only add, that I intend, God willing, to be at Ghent before the end of this week; where I defire to know where I may wait upon your majeity, together with the lord chancellor and lord Ormond, for certainly fome quick refolution is to be taken concerning your perfon and affairs, and I begin to be clear to myfelf in what I ought to advife concerning both, which when you command me I fhall do with all franknefs and fidelity."

Newport, this 3d of July, 1658. An original.

The death of the protector Oliver, which followed on the 3d of September, 1658, difpelled those threatening clouds which endangered the very existence of Charles the Second, and feemed for a moment to prefent him with a more immediate profpect of attaining his object. The first letter that appears with an account of the protector's death is from Mr. Howard (then a prifoner in London) to the lord chancellor Hyde. This letter, and one written on the fame occasion by lord Culpepper to the chancellor, we shall lay before our readers: the latter, indeed, contains fo much good fenfe, and fuch found reflections and observations on the thea posture of the king's affaire, that it cannot be too much admired.

Mr. Fisher (Howard) to the Lord Chancellor Hyde.

" My Lord,

"YOU cannot expect a large and particular account of things from a perfon under reftraint; yet as a teflimony that I ftill retain a tenfe of the daty I owe to his majefty and your lordfhip, I have made a fhift to fteal an opportunity for this fhort correspondence in the concealment of our old character. To this I am the more forward, as being defirous to be an early, though I defpair of being the first meffenger of those happy tidings which have put a countenance of victory already upon all England, and will, I doubt not, be as welcome to you as 'tis believed it will be advantageous unto your affairs. Yefterday it pleafed God, out of his infinite goodnefs, to do that which he would not allow any man the honour of doing, putting an end to the life of him, under the weight of whole tyranny these diftreffed kingdoms have groaned many years. In the evening his cldeft fon was declared his fucceffor, and this whole day has been fpent in the pageantry of fuch folemnities as the occasion required. All men's hearts (almost quite dead before) are of a fudden wonderfully revived to an expectation of fome great change, and good men are the more encouraged to hope that the effects of fo altogether an unexpected providence will be of much good to the kingdom, as observing that God himfelf feems to have undertalien the work, having thus feafonably removed the great obstructor of our happiness by his own hand. Oh! for God's take, my lord, as you tender the happinels of that good king. and the welfare of bleeding kingdoms, let not delays lofe the benefit of fuch an happy juncture, nor fuffer vain hopes and confidences in falle friends any longer to frustrate your defigns and defude your counfels. Here is yet no face of oppofition in the army, or any part of it. Some there are who conceive great hopes (how well grounded I know not) of Monk's defection; I can fay nothing to the contrary, I shall be glad if it prove fo, which a little time will shew, but 'tis not to be depended upon unlefs your own correfpondencies with him give you better affarance than either common fame fame or opinion. Mr. Stephens is in Scotland with Monk at this time; who knows what their difcontents (for I believe they want not their difcontents) may work them to? This is chimera, God forbid you fhould have no better flaff to lean upon. Lord Fairfax, and Lambert, are they both quite dead ? I wifh Lambert were dead, for I find the army much devoted to him, but I cannot perceive that he is any way to be reconciled to the king ; fo that 'tis no fmall danger that his reputation with the army may thrust Dick Cromwell (who fits like an age on horfeback) out of the faddle, and yet not help the king into it; this would be a malo ad pejus. But for Fairfax, fure he might be brought to fomething, and the rather by reafon of his fon, the duke of Buckingham's imprisonment. For my own part, my lord, I am and ever shall be ready to my power to obey all commands you shall pleafe to lay upon me. Since the tyrant's death, 1 am freed from many fears, which before were upon me; he did express (as I am informed) very much rancour against me, and I do verily believe, that if he had lived he would have been wanting in no point of cruelty towards me; he had figned a warrant for my commitment to the Tower, fix weeks fince, but it has plcafed God to hinder the execution of it, first by the death of his daughter, afterwards by his own, and fince by the distraction of affairs; hence it comes to pafs that 1 am as yet in this place, but not without every day's fear of being fent to the Tower. I have never yet been examined, but am told, that they pofitively conclude me to have had correspondence with you, and to have been divers times in Flanders. - 1 am alfo told that the old tyrant boafted that he had been acquainted with all my motions and actions. above this year, and that he had his information from one that was my chief confidant. This might juftly give me occasion to suspect Wildman, but I have had more caufe to fuspect him fince, upon two undeniable and unantwerable demonstrations; one is, that the officers of this garriion, by direction without doubt from Thusloe, have been with me enquiring of me, if I did not know Sir William Compton, and Sir R. Willis, affuring me of my liberty if I would difcover them, and threatening me with the Tower, &c. if I were obstinate : to all these enquiries, promites, and threats, I anfivered that I did indeed know Sir William Compton and Sir R. Wil is by fight, having sometimes seen them in transitu, but that I had not any acquaintance at all with them, much lefs had I any correspondence with them or any others about those things they did enquire ; hereupon they were very angry, telling me, that I had better have dealt more ingenuoufly, f'r they did know all my practices, which I fhould foon be made to understand, cum multis allis. What can be more plain than this? I am fare none but Wildman could difcover this. Two or three days after I was used with some severity; but when they did find that I was regardless of it, they returned to a little more lenity, which has been continued ever fince. The other demonstration is plainer than this; fince my confinement I have had fome difcourfe with one who was in the late engagement with colonel Stapeley, and he not knowing that Wildman was known to me, made it plain, by many circumstances, that Wildman and captain Bishop were the M<sub>3</sub> the first discoverers of that defign. O tempora, O mores! The reason why Sir W. Compton and Sir R. Willis are releafed, and I am not examined, I suppose is, that Wildman may not be discovered to have been the traitor, hoping that they may make use of him for a spy hercafter. This I the rather conjecture, becaufe Wildman fent to me to affure me that he is honeft, and to defire me to have a good opinion of him; but this bait will not take. Mr. Stephens does take much pains to excufe himfelf (as I hear) but all he can fay does only excufe him atanto, not a toto : betwixt thefe two millftones I am grinded to powder. I fee I am not to expect my liberty, till force shall free me, for every one does tell me that Thurloe is not to be inclined to any favour without a great ranfom, and that nothing less than 523 l. is to be named to him; it is altogether impoffible for me to provide such a sum without your affiftance; and truly, my lord, I cannot value myfelf at fo high a rate, as to think myfelf fo much deferving your care, especially confidering your condition, and the charge I have been to you already. • • • • * Let me hear from you, and if you can fpeak comfortably, comfort a poor prisoner, who does earneftly pray for you, and is,

Yours, &c."

Lord Culpepper to the Lord Chancellor Hyde.

" I TAKE it for granted this change in England will require your conftant attendance at Hockstraten, which makes me addrefs this letter thither, and I shall follow it as foon as my young mafter fhall have fealed fome writings betwixt him and his relations, which (they being ready engroffed here, and he fent for) I hope will be done on Monday. I cannot fay 1 am much furprifed with the news of Cromwell's death, the letters of the last week (those of this are not come yet) leaving him defperately fick of a palfy and quartan ague, yet the thing is of fo great confequence that I can hardly forbear rubbing my eyes to find whether I fleep or wake. The first news of it came not hither until very late (at the fhutting the gates) laft night, though he died this day fevennight at three of the clock. The ports were shut upon his death fo frictly, that Monf. Newport's pafs was returned, and he had difficulty enough to get leave to fend a ship of his own hiring upon Saturday night. Extraordinary care was taken that no English passengers should come in that fhip; yet fome did, and amongst them a woman now in this town, who faith that Cromwell's eldeft fon was proclaimed protector on Saturday morning, which is confirmed by a Dutchman now here, who came from Gravefend on Tuefday. All the comment he makes on the text (it is a common failor) is, that he heard the people curfe when he was proclaimed. This accident must make a great change in the face of affairs throughout all Chriftendom, and we may reasonably hope the first and best will be in England. As for this town they are mad with joy; no man is at leifure to buy or fell; the young fry dance in the ffreets at noonday; the devil is dead is the language at every turn; and the entertainment of the graver fort is only to contemplate the happy days now approaching. What

What the king is to do upon this great and good change in England is now before you; to which most important question, though with the disadvantage of my being absent, I shall freely (but privately to yourfelf) deliver my opinion before it is asked; which is, that you ought not to be over hafty in doing any thing in England, neither by proclaiming the king, nor by any other public act, until you shall truly and particularly know the ftate of affairs there, without which, Solomon, if he were alive and with you, could not make a right judgment of what is to be done there. By the flate of affairs there, I mean not only what is acted at the council board, in the army, city, and country, but likewife how those feveral bodies are generally affected to this nomination of Cromwell's fon; what opinion they have of, and kindness to, his perfon; who is difcontented at it, and upon what account they are fo, and to what degree; what formed parties are made or making against it; and how they propose to carry on their defign, whether under the veil of a parliament, or by open declared force; how Monk and Mr. Harry Cromwell like it, and of what confideration Lambert is upon this change; most of these, and many other particulars, ought to be well known, upon able and impartial intelligence from the place, before you can be ready for a judgment either of the defign itfelf, or of the timing it; and, in the mean time, both the king's party in England, and we here, cannot (in my opinion) act too filent a part. When their partialities shall come to the height, that is, when the fword shall be drawn, our tale will be heard, the weakeft party will be glad to take us by the hand and give us the means of arming and embodying ourfelves, and then will be our time to fpeak our own language. But if we appear before upon our own account, it will only ferve to unite our enemies, and confirm their new government by a victory over us, whereby we fhall be utterly difabled to do our daty when the true feafon fhall come, which I doubt not will quickly be, if we have but the patience to wait for it. But whilft I thus declare my opinion against their abortions, I would not be understood that no endeavours of ours may be proper to haften the timely birth; on the contrary, 1 think much good is to be done by diferent and fecret application, by well chosen perfons, to those of power and interest amongst them, whom we shall find most discontented with Cromwell's partiality in fetting this young man over their heads that have borne the brunt of the day in the common caufe, as they call it; and who have fo good an opinion of themfelves, as to believe that they have deferved as much of them they fought for as Cromwell himfelf did. Who thefe are is not easy for us as yet to know, but fuch there are certainly, and a little time will eafily difcover them; and probably enough we may find fome of them in Cromwell's own family, and amongst those that in his life fluck closeft to him. Be they where they will, if they have power, and will do good, they ought to be cherished. But the person that my eye is chiefly on, as able alone to reftore the king, and not abfolutely averfe to it, neither in his principles, nor in his affections, and that is as like to be unfatisfied with this choice as any other amongst them, is Monk, who commandeth abfolutely at his devotion a better army (as I M 4 2112 am informed) than that in England is, and in the king's quarrel can bring with him the ftrength of Scotland, and fo protect the northern counties that he cannot fail of them in his march; the reputation whereof (if he declares) will as much give the will to the appearing of the king's party in the reft of England, as the drawing the army from the fouthern, weftern, and eastern counties, will give them the means to appear in arms. Thus the work will be certainly done, in fpight of all opposition that can be apprehended, and the gaining of one man will alone make fure work of the whole. I need not give you his character; you know he is a fullen man, that values him enough, and much believes that his knowledge and reputation in arms fits him for the title of highness and the office of protector, better than Mr. Richard Cromwell's skill in horfe-races and hufbandry doth. You know befides, that the only ties that have hitherto kept him from grumbling, have been the vanity of conftancy to his professions, and his affection to Cromwell's perfon, the latter whereof is doubly diffolved, first by the jealoufies he had of him, and now by his death; and if he be handfomely put in mind who was his first mafter, and what was promifed him when he came out of the Tower, the first foruple will not long trouble him. Nothing of either of them can now flick with him; and befides, if I am well informed, he that lately believed his head was in danger from the father (and therefore no arts nor importunities could bring him to London) will not eafily The way to deal with trust the fon. him is, by fome fit perfon (which I think is the greatest difficulty) to fhew him plainly, and to give him all imaginable fecurity for it, that he shall better find all his ends (those of honour, power, profit, and fafety) with the king, than in any other way he can take. Neither are we to boggle at any way he fhall propose in declaring himsclf, let it at the first be presbyterian, be king and parliament, be a third party, or what he will, fo it oppose the present power, it will at laft do the king's bufinefs; and after a little time he will and must alone fall into the track we would have him go in; when he is engaged paft a retreat he will want you as much as you will want him, and you may mould him into what form you pleafe. You have my opinion (though in too much hafte) pray think ferioufly of it. * * * * * *

Amfterdam, Sept. 20, 1658. An original.

The following terms, offered to general Monk, foon after the protector's death, by Charles the Second, we fhall also infert here.

The King to Lord Falconbridge, the Lord Bellafis, and Sir John Greenville, or either of them.

" I AM confident that George Monk can have no malice in his heart againft me, nor hath he done any thing againft me, which I cannot very cafily pardon; and it is in his power to do me fo great fervice, that I cannot eafily reward, but I will do all I can; and I do authorize you, and either of you, with the advice of the reft, to treat with him, and not only to affure him of my kindnefs, but that I will very liberally reward him with fuch an effate in land, and fuch a ticle of honour, honour, as himfelf fhall defire, if he will declare for me, and adhere to my intereft; and whatever you fhall promife to him on my behalf, or whatever he, or you by his advice, fhall promife to any of his officers, or the army, under his com mand, which command he fhall fiill keep, I will make good and perform upon the word of a king."

A rough draught by the Lord Chancellor Hyde.

From this period to the king's refloration, there is preferved in this volume a most minute and almost daily account of the transactions in England, and of the various fchemes, plans, and operations of the king's friends and adherents there. The principal letters are such as are either addreffed to, or written by, the lord chancellor; and of fuch as come under the first description, the most material are from the lord Mordaunt, Mr. Broderick, and Mr. Thefe contain fome ex-Rumbold. ceilent defcriptions of, and remarks on, the different fects and parties which divided this country at the death of Oliver Cromwell; including, with their respective leaders, the levellers, the prefbyterians, the anabaptifts, the republicans, the fanatics, and fifth monarchy men .---Perhaps thefe two laft, without committing a folecifm in party, may be joined together as one body.

Upon the death of the protector Oliver, who was himfelf to a feeble a reftraint upon them, these parties broke out into open hoftilities with one another—each carving feparately for itself, and, in proportion to the abilities of its leaders, and its own ftrength, affuming the entire conduct of affairs.

Neither the fuccession of Richard

Cromwell to the protectorfhip, nor his deposition, feems to have met with the flighteft interruption; and could the various factions as eafily have fettled their own differences, as they feem to have been able to oppofe Charles the Second, the government of the country might have acquired fuch a degree of confiftency as would have been for ever fatal to the king's interefts.

The origin and progress of the rifing in the west, in favour of his majeity, and the suppression of that rifing by general Lambert, is fully detailed in the letters of the lord Mordaunt and others.

The conduct of general Monk, who was to fingularly inftrumental in effecting the reftoration, has been always looked upon, during this period, as fingularly ambiguous.  $B_Y$ his defeat of Lambert, he obtained the entire and uncontrolled poffeffion of the army, but at the fame time he feems to have been quite undetermined in what manner he fhould act; and fo far certainly that conduct must have appeared exceed. ingly ambiguous to others, which was not regulated by any certain views or principles in the man that purfued it.

Security, and an high fituation, wasthe end general Monk aimedat; and whether that end was to be attained by means of the King, or of the Rump, feems at bottom to have been a matter of equal indifference to him. In fhort, he had not the caufe of either, or of any party, at heart, but became, without having any premeditated feheme in view, the fortunate and happy influment of putting an end to the confufed and unnatural flate into which his country was plunged.

Thus Monk, upon his arrival in London

170 ANNUAL REGISTER, 1786.

London from the north, first declares himfelf the fervant of the Rump, then of a free parliament to be chosen under certain refirictions and regulations, and, laftly, experimentally finding that neither the one nor the sther could effectuate an established government, he, in concurrence with the majority of the latter, and of the nation in general, declares for the king, (having first made his own conditions for himfelf and his army:) thus throughout rather progreffively following the humour of the nation, than endeavouring to direct its course.

The lord Mordaunt's account of the flate of the nation, transmitted to the king but a few months before his refloration, we shall next lay before our readers.

Lord Mordaunt to the King.

" Sir,

" SINCE our laft it hath been my care in particular to look into the ftate of the city, parliament, armies, and navy, and I humbly here prefent you my poor opinion of their prefent condition.

The State of the City.

The citizens have not at all receded from their firft declaration; and, though they are flill unanimous as to the point of money, yet the fpeedy march of Monk makes them flectuate. As to other things, moft with him a friend on feveral accounts; one is, becaufe they believe his faith prefbyterian; the other is grounded on a belief, which we dare not contradict, and that is, that the prefbyterians defire only the honour of reftoring your majefly, that by the merit of fo fignal an action, their notorious crimes may be forgiven and forgotten; yet becaufe the heart of man is deceitful, I have fo far prevailed with the citizens, and fome heads of the feeluded members, as to prepare to oppose this clouded foldier, in cafe he prove other than what they would have him. Truly, Sir, the confernation was to great and fo univerfal upon the defection of Lambert's forces and Monk's march, that when I came, had Monk been here, he might have given what law he pleafed, and been, at leaft for a time, punctually obeyed ; but by difcourfes I have fo far prevailed with the most eminent of this place, that they know it yet lays in their power to give a check not only to Monk, but to what party foever they fhall prefume to impole upon them in this work. Alderman Robinson hath been the most useful, and it was he only that caufed that claufe of " convening a full and free parliament," according to the ancient and fundamental laws of the land, to be inferted in the Declaration. The last letter from Monk displeafed them, but private instructions by the fword-bearer give them fresh hopes. Browne is wholly off from the rigid fcore, and he and alderman Robinfon and Langham have raifed 15,000l. which Ingoldfby is to manage to take off a part of the flanding army, upon which we are also to appear. If this fucceeds, your majesty will be restored without terms; and, if my lord Manchester and others of his cabal prevent it not, I have all the reason in the world to hope it may. I have spoken with major Wood, and instructed him as well as I can, and I have conftant meetings twice a day with Robinfon, Robinfon, fo that I do not only engage for him in this affair, but will be responsible for Ingoldsby in all he undertakes, that he fhall purely and clearly act as your majefty fhall command him, or as the commiffioners shall direct. It now appears his interest is the greatest of any man's in England, except Monk's, who is at the head of an army. This, Sir, I am pofitive in, and will be answerable for any failing on his part, as to his courage or cordialnefs in relation to your majefty's intereit. Browne and he act together, but neither are willing to treat with Manchester, who discouraged the laft defign. This night we come to a conclusion; our terms are four pounds for every horfeman, and two pounds for every foot foldier. As Browne and I shall agree, we shall engage or defist, and that will be as the pulle of the foldiers beats; for if we draw off four regiments, they will posses the gates till we embody, and then we hope your majefty will think it a reafonable undertaking. When I commend to your majefty the complexion of the city, I mean the body both reprefentative and diffusive; for the head, to wit, the court of aldermen, are generally naught, there being nineteen of the four and twenty purchafers of crown and church lands, which, with other mercenary motives, make them a corrupt court.

The State of the Parliament as I conceive.

The prefent complexion of the parliament is very pale, Sir Arthur Hafferig undermined by Cooper, Morley, and Weaver, and from a rhodomonte is reduced to a pitiful rogue. Neville props him up, and that he may be yet fuftained, they both endeavour the introduction of Sir Henry Vane; the firength of their argument receiving force from his being irreconcileable to your majefty's interest and family; but all will not do, and therefore he disowns them for a parliament, believing his being of it effential to its conftitution. Cooper yet hath his tongue well hung, and words at will, and employs his rhetoric to cafhier all officers, civil as well as military, that fided with Fleetwood,

Lambert, and Morley, and rebukes all the fectaries; thus those two garble the army and state. Neville oppofeth thefe, and argues for liberty in fo general a fenfe, that he is de nouveau concluded an atheist. By a petition delivered by Lawfon they defigned Sir Henry Vane's readmission, but Lawson was for a time fuspended from his charge upon this account. This evinceth the truth of an account of what I prefumed to tell your majesty of Sir H.Vane's interest in the navy. The parties in the house are diametrically oppolite; the three and twenty with Cooper, who acts Cicero, and fome fixteen with Neville, who reprefents Antony. Since the old fpeaker fays his conflitution is ill, we conclude the parliament fo, and believe Monk and he understand each other. Daily new leaks fpring in this old rotten veffel, and they have already lost all the idolatrous reverence paid to parliaments. Sir Arthur Haflerig accused Ingoldsby for being in arms in Sir George Broth's businefs, upon which, though he purged himfelf, he loft the regiment he was courted to receive, and we fo firm a foundation as that would have been to-us. The last joco di mano, was the the differtion between the hou and the council of flate; the first command Monk to march flowly thither with his whole army, the laft command him to halt. I think I shall have little occasion for the future to fend your majefy accounts of the Rump, believing it may be in an unfavory condition.

The State of Lambert's Army.

This body, being composed of fectaries, libertines, and anabaptifts, is prudently by Monk commanded into Scotland; where (if, his ambition blinding his reafon, he fets up on his own (core) they will be the most proper fcourge for the prefbyter. And thus he may defign the buy a regiment of horse, his giving Scotch army, which he leads himfelf to subdue the sectaries here. And those lunatics, to keep in order the violent kirkmen, Morgan commands in nature of a major general. Their numbers are decreafed, many following the example of their general, and perhaps refolving to purfue his fortune, who is now very bufy here; and if from fo fmall a fpark he raifes a combustion, it will be the moft wonderful change yet feen, and may in future ages pafs for a miracle.

The State of Monk's Army.

. The general opinion (which always magnifies the fuccelsful, and often unjuftly condemns the unfortunate) is, that fince this long and fad rebellion, no army was ever fo well difciplined and officered as this; the numbers, by the beft account I can truft to, amount to 7000 horfe And it feems to me a and foot. wonder, in this weather, it gathers not like a fnow-ball. What effect

Monk's conference with Fairfax hath produced is not yet known; this night I exped it from Rufhworth, his fecretary; in the mean time we all change our opinion, and believe they have a good underftanding, I mean in relation to what I wifh. He brings 25,0001. along with him; thus his prudence mafters Lambert's choler, and certainly he had read Taffo's

Fu il vincer fempre mai laudabil cofa, Vinca fi pur d'ingegno o pur di forza.

He is now at Newark. I hope we make no ill conclusion when we suppose him ours, upon the ground of his giving commission to the Fenwicks (iccluded members) to the government of Newcastle to Elifon, one of the fame ftamp, and his employing colonel Bethell, an honeft lay elder as we call him. I can fay little more of him, but that he is a black Monk, and I cannot fee through him.

The State of the Army here.

That the whole or part is to be bought I hope to produce demonftration; and, though the defign hath taken air some weeks, yet I hope to fee good effects from the conjunction of Browne, Ingoldfby, and Robinson. The fum of 15,0001. is raifed for the prefent, but if not made use of in two days, the contract is null. The foldiers are independent of their officers, and by reafon of the frequent changes, never permitted any officer to make himfelf beloved or popular; an agitator will do mere in an hour than all the officers in a day, and they will either march or refuse it, as the last impression works upon them, them. Just now the gates are all fecured, and the inclosed, from the earl of Crawford, makes me fear an ill change, and that Monk is a devil; but an attempt may prevent all, which, if it be found reasonable, we will hazard, and leave the fuccess to your majesty. 1 fend the original from the earl.

The State of the Navy.

iff It feems to be fad, fince field and poor are in conjunction; fixteen frigates are yet kept out, else their clamour would state their condition better than I can. I expect daily Mr. Bremes, and then I will venture on Lawfon myfelf. -Mr.Ford is engaged by Rumbold, and his interest is great among the cuptains; fo that, if the faints continue oppreffed, I despair not of giving a better account than I am able at prefent to do. Fourteen of the first and fecond rate lay at Rochefter, but neither manned or tight; the arrears due on this account are vafi; all these laid together, promises or money may do the work, but this I fpeak not politively."

London, January 16, 1659-60. An original.

We fhall conclude our account of this valuable work with the infertion of the two following letters; the first from the king to general Monk, in answer to one of the general's to his majesty inclosing the address and declaration of the army; the last, from the general to the king, on the recognition of his majesty's title by both houses of parliament.

The King to General Monk.

" General Monk,

" I WAS the last week dif-patching Bernard Grenville with my answer to yoars of the 20th of lait month, when, in the inftant as he was departing, I received the good news of what was done on May-day, upon the reception of my letters and declaration in the two houses, which made most of what I had writ to you unneceffary to be fent, and fo I kept the meffenger still here. I have fince received yours of the 5th by fir Thomas Clarges, with the address the officers of the army made to you, upon which I shall not enlarge till the return of the fame meffenger. I have likewife another from you of the fame date; upon all which, befides the great miracles which God Almighty hath wrought upon the hearts of the nation, I must ever acknowledge your extraordinary affection to me, and your very difcreet conduct of this great work, in which you have had to do with perfons of fuch different humours and contrary affections, which you have wonderfully composed. And yet you cannot but expost that there are many perions still contriving the fame mifchiefs against me and you, and who mult be rather suppressed by your authority and power, than won and reconciled by your indulgence; and, it may be, a little feverity towards fome would fooner reduce the reft than any thing you can elie do. You may be most confilent, and I do again renew my promife to vou, for the performance of which you may engage your life. that I will make good whatever you have found neceffary to promife to those of your army who have and fhall adhere to you to make your bufinefs the more eafy; and I am molt confident, if I were with you. I fhould in a much fhorter time fatisfy them, and put them into a full fecurity, fecurity, than will be done by those formal ways which I hear fome men endeavour to go about, and in which many obstructions will be found, which I could eafily remove and prevent; and if any courfe be taken, in which a just discontent remains with any, and justice itfelf be wounded, the foundation is not well laid for a lafting fecurity. I am confident I shall prevent all inconveniences of this kind when I am with you, which I must conjure you to hatten by all your intereft. And I tell you again, I will not leave myfelf bread, rather than every thing shall not be performed which you promife to your officers and foldiers on my behalf. I am confident you know there hath been, and is still, a cabal which endeavours to infuse and keep alive all ill humours and diffatisfaction in the army and in the houfes, to obstruct and defer my being fent for, which, by the bleffing of God, can only put an end to all diffempers ; and therefore I must conjure you to use all your intereft for the removal of all those obstructions, and all unneceffary formalities, which may retard my coming. And you may be as confident, as of any thing in this world, that if it were in my power to recede from any thing I have promifed in my declaration or letters, I would as much abhor the doing it as any wickedness that can be imagined; and furely a full and general fecurity, which no man is more folicitous to establish than I am, can never be fo well provided for as by my prefence with you, which, by God's bleffing, would difappoint all ill defigns which are contrived against me and you, and the peace of the nation. I expect within few days the arrival of the commissioners from the parliament, and for their better reception and accommodation, this town being already too full, I refolve to accept the ftate's invitation, and to go on Monday or Tuefday next to the Hague, as the neareft and most commodious place from whence I may embark, for which you will easily believe I have longing enough, that I may fee you, and let the world fee the fense I have of the great fervice you have done for

General Monk to the King.

" May it pleafe your Majesty,

"TUESDAY last I attended your majesty's two houses of parliament to proclaim the recognition of your royal right unto your imperial crowns. By the universal joy in the performance, it appeared that God hath given to your feepter the hearts of your people; who, though they have been by necessity and force agitated to different points, yet, like a needle truly touched, reft only in this magnetic determination towards your majefty; whole royal heart, touched with the divine grace, I am fure is fixed to make it the glory of your majesty to advance the crown and fcepter of our Lord Chrift, and that under you all your people may lead a peaceable life in all godlinefs and honefty.

"This bearer, major Robert Harley, whofe faithful endeavours have not been wanting to your majefty's fervice, will acquaint your majefty with the defires of your parliament for your majefty's fpeedy return into your dominions. To which I take the boldnefs to add my humble opinion, that now your majefty's jesty's prefence and authority is very neceffary to preferve that happy peace your realms enjoy through divine goodness.

The following Report was by Mistake omitted in the State Papers for this Year, and is therefore inferted here.

The Sixth Report of the Commiffioners appointed to examine, take, and frate, the Public Accounts of the Kingdom.

Prefented to the Houfe of Commons on the 11th of February, 1782.

IN purfuance of the directions of the act by which we are appointed, our attention has hitherto been engaged, principally in marking the delay which affects the public money in its paffage, either from the pocket of the fubject into the Exchequer, or from the Exchequer back again into the pofferfion of the perfon who becomes entitled to it; but of flill greater importance to the public is the diminution it fuffers in its progrefs.

Intent upon the object pointed out to us by the act, as the first for our confideration, namely, that the public might avail themfelves, as foon as poffible, of the balances in the hands of accountants; we have, in the offices that have as yet come under our examination, applied ourfelves chiefly to the invefligation of thefe balances, and reported upon them with as much expedition as we were able; adding only fuch fuggestions of immediate regulation as arole out of the fubject, and occurred to us in the course of that inveftigation, but deferring, as a matter separate and diffinct, the execution of that part of the act which directs us " to report an exact frate of the fees or gratuities paid or given in collecting, iffuing, expending, and accounting for the public monies, and the authority under which fuch fees and gratuities are paid or received."

In the course of our examination into the office of the paymaftergeneral of the forces, we observed in the account of the payments made by him out of the deductions of twelve-pence in the pound, and one day's pay, for the year 1778, annexed to our last report, No. 7, a charge of 32,5571. 7s. 10d. paid for fees at the Exchequer. So large a fum of fees paid by one officer, to one office, in one year, demanded our attention, and led us to require from this office the fum total of the fees paid at the receipt of his majefty's Exchequer, by the paymaiter-general of the forces, during the year 1780; the accounts of that year being then under our confideration.

By the return made to that requifition, it appears that thefe fees, in the year 1780, amounted to 39,1981. 6s. rod.; and that they confilted of a poundage on the money iffued.

As the annual fupplies laft year exceeded that of all former years, and may increase, and all poundage fees on those supplies will increase in proportion, we thought it incumberst upon upon us to proceed to an immediate examination into the article of fees, and of the principles upon which they are founded; to the intent, that, fhould they be deemed a fubject worthy the interpolition of the legiflature, the public may not remain without the benefit of a tpeedy remedy for a prefling and increasing evil.

We have had under our examination two offices of large public expenditure; the pay-office of the navy, and the pay-office of the army. To each of thefe we iffued our precepts for an exact flate of the falaries, fees, and gratuities, received by the respective officers and clerks in those offices, from the 24th of December, 1779, to the 25th of December, 1780, with the amount thereof received by each officer and clerk, during the faid period.

To the feveral branches of the receipt of his majefty's Exchequer, that is to fay, to the auditor, the clerk of the pells, the tellers, the chamberlains, the ufher, and the paymafters of exchequer bills, we iffued the like precepts; and returns were made to us from all thefe offices.

We have thought it expedient, in the courfe of this enquiry, where the office is not executed by the principal officer, but by his deputy, or firit clerk, to examine the latter only, as probably beft qualified to give us the information we wanted. We have omitted likewife, as more minute than necefiary, to examine thofe inferior officers and clerks who receive fmall falaries only, or inconfiderable fees.

As our account of the emoluments of these offices is taken in a year of the most expensive war, we have required and flated, where we have been able to obtain it, the net produce of each office in time of peace.

At the close of our examination into each office, we have flated, and inferted in the appendix, an account of the falaries, allowances, fees, and gratuities, diffinguished under their feveral heads, and the total amount thereof received by each officer and clerk in that office, with the fums paid for taxes, and other difburfements; and the net produce to each officer and clerk, during the year 1780; and diffinguishing, as far as appeared to us, without entering into too long an examination, to what amount each office is a charge upon the public, the civil lift, and individuals. But we must at the fame time remark. that most of the fums for fees and gratuities, flated by us as paid by individuals, are ultimately paid by, and a charge upon, either the civil lift or the public. This latter diftinction we have made, not confidering the interest of the crown as feparate from the interest of the public; but becaufe the favings, if fuch there fhould be, will in the one cafe, fall into the fund appropriated for the fupport of his majefty's civil government, and in the other, into the finking fund.

We have diffinguished the taxes paid by the officers, that is, the landtax, and the one shilling and fix penny dutics, from their other difburfements; because the charge of the public, in supporting these offices, is leffened by as much of thefe taxes as get back again into the Exchequer. But, not being able easily to discover what diminution they fuffer in their progress, we have only flated the amount of them, without deducting them from the expence of the public.

From

From the return of the pay-office of the navy, and from the examinations of the right hon. Welbore Ellis, treasurer of the navy; Andrew Douglas, efq. his paymafter; John Slade, efq. first clerk in the cashier's branch; Adam Jellicoe, esq. first clerk in the pay branch; George Swaffield, efq. cashier; Mr. John Fennell, chief clerk, and Mr. Robert Walker, fecond clerk in the victualling branch, we obtained the following information relative to the profits accruing to the officers and clerks in this office.

The bufinefs in the pay-office of the navy is transacted by these eafurer, the paymaker, and thirtyfive officers and clerks, nine of which are in the cashier's branch, twenty in the pay branch, and fix in the victualling branch.

The profits of these officers confift of fix heads-falaries; allowances for extra fervices, and for telling money at the Bank; perquifites of odd pence; for calling defalcations; and for entering probates and other inftruments.

The treasurer and his paymaster are paid by falaries only, and have no other fee or gratuity whatever. The officers and clerks receive falaries, and alfo the allowances and perquifites above mentioned.

The treasurer is appointed by the crown, and holds his office during pleafure. He receives a falary of two thousand pounds a-year, reduced, by the payment of the one shilling and fixpenny duties, to 1,850l. He appoints the paymafter, and all the other officers and clerks in the office.

The paymaster has a falary of 500l. a-year, reduced by the fame duties to 4621. 10s. He executes also the offices of cashier and accountant, for which he receives no additional falary or emolument whatever.

The falaries of the other officers and clerks are from forty to eighty pounds a-year, according to their feveral employments. Befides which, they have the allowances and perquifites following.

An allowance for extra fervice, which is made to those clerks who attend the payment of wages and the yards, and who complete what are called the full books for payment of the fhips and yards. This allowance is intended to defray their travelling expences, and as a recompence for their extra trouble. The rate at which it is paid is feven shillings a day for the number of days in which each clerk is to employed.

An allowance for telling money at the Bank is a poundage, at the rate of five shillings for every thoufand pounds, allowed by the navy board to those clerks who receive money at the Bank for the payment of the fhips and yards; in confequence of which allowance, each clerk is accountable for any deficiency there may be either in the weight or tale of the money he receives.

The odd pence is a perquifite to those officers and clerks, who are employed in making payments. Those whose business it is to pay perfect bills, the navy courfe, and bills drawn by the navy and fick and hurt boards, pay the even money only upon thefe bills, and retain to themfelves the odd pence under a fhilling. Those who are employed in the payment of the officers, feamen, and artificers in the dockyards, retain the odd pence under fix-pence; in confideration of which, they are all bound to make good any miftakes mistakes they may make in their payments.

The perquifite for calling defalcations, is a gratuity, ufually at the rate of one guinea by the hundred pounds, paid by the chaplains, furgeons, and purfers of the navy, to the officer who cafts and pays to them their feveral fhares of the deductions made from the feamen's wages.

The perquisite for entering probates of wills, letters of administration, and warrants of attorney, is a fee of two shillings and fix pence each entry, paid to the clerk in whose department it lies to register these inftruments.

The falaries and allowances for extra-fervices, and for telling money at the Bank, are paid, for the moft part, quarterly, by bills affigned by the navy or victualling boards upon the treafurer, out of money received by him, either to pay falaries, or from old flores, or under fome other head of fervice fpecified in the affignments; and confequently all thefe are paid by the public.

The perquifites are either detained out of fums due to particular perfons, or paid by those who apply to have their business transacted at the office; and therefore do not come out of the public purse, but from the pockets of individuals.

The authority upon which the receipt of the feveral profits of this office is grounded, is either an order of the privy-council, or ufage.

By an order of the privy-council, dated the 2;th of May, 1699, the falary of the treafurer of the navy is fettled at two thoufand pounds a year; that of his paymaiter, at five hundred pounds; that of his accountant, at four hundred pounds : and the falaries of thirteen clerks, feven at eighty pounds each, and fix at forty pounds each; and in the ordinary effimate of the navy, voted by parliament every year, are inferted allowances-to the treafurer of the navy, two thousand pounds; to his paymatter and cafhier, five hundred pounds; to twenty-two clerks, fix of them eighty pounds, nine fifty pounds, and feven forty pounds each. But an increase of the busineis in this office for these late years, has rendered it necessary to increafe the clerks to the prefent number, thirty-five ; and to every increafe the confent of the navyboard is neceffary.

The allowances and perquifites are fuch as have been ufually paid and taken by the officers and clerks in their feveral departments, as far back as the memory of the oldeft officers, now employed in this office, reaches.

From the account fet forth in the appendix, it appears, that the grofs amount of the emoluments received in the pay-office of the navy, was 8, 150l. 105.  $\frac{1}{3}$ d.; of which the falaries, allowances for extra-fervice, and for telling money at the Bank, amounting to 6,545l. 4s. 8d. was paid by the public; and the refidue, being 1,605l. 5s.  $4\frac{1}{2}$ d. by individuals; the net receipt of this office was 7,938l.  $\frac{1}{2}$ d.

By the return made to us from the pay-office of the army, and the evaminations of the right hon. Richard Rigby, paymatter-general of the forces; Timothy Cafwall, efq. deputy paymatter; John Powell, efq. cafhier; Charles Bembridge, efq. accountant; John Adam Frederick Heffe, efq. ledger-keeper; Thomas Bangham, efq. efq. computer of off-reckonings; Robert Randoll, efq. cafhier of half-pay; and Richard Molefworth, efq. entering clerk; we received the following account of the falaries paid to, and the fees and gratuities taken by, the officers and clerks in the pay-office of the army.

This office confifts of the paymafter-general, his deputy, a cafhier, an accountant, a ledgerkceper, a computer of off-reckenings, a cafhier of half-pay, and an entering clerk, with eight inferior clerks, an office-keeper, a houfe-keeper, and two meffengers; and nine deputy paymalters abroad.

The paymafter-general appoints his deputies, and all the officers and clerks employed in his office : they are all paid by falaries or atlowances, fees and gratuities.

The paymafter-general, his deputy, the inferior officers and clerks, and deputy paymafters abroad, have certain falaries or allowances only; the fix officers who are next to the deputy paymafter, receive falaries, fees, and gratuities.

The paymaster-general is appointed by letters patent under the great feal, during pleafure; he receives four annual allowances as paymaster-general of the forces, and one as treasurer of Chelfea hofpital: the four are, 3,000l. as the particular falary belonging to his office, 1,760l. for the payment of clerks, 600l. for the contingent expences of his office, and twenty fhillings a day as one of the staff upon the establishment; the other allowance is twenty fhillings a day as treafurer of Chelfez hospital. The amount of these allowances is 6,0921.: out of which he paid for himself and officers, in taxes, 9621.198.9d.; to clerks 17071.; and for the contingent diffursements of his office, 3601. 7s. 8d.; making together 3,0301.7s. 5d. which reduced hi. clear receipt to 3,0611.128.7d.

The deputy paymafter has two falaries, of 5001, a year each; one reduced, by the one shilling and fixpenny duties, to 4621, 103, the other paid without deduction; together, clear, 9621, 103.

The fix following officers are thofe who have fees and gratuities as well as falaries.

The cathier receives a falary of 2001. a year, reduced by the one fhilling duty to 1901.; and an additional annual allowance of 27cl. paid to him without deduction. His fees and gratuities amounted to 6,7151. 19s. 6d. which, with his falaries, made his clear receipt 7,1751. 198. 6d. But, as thefe fees are not always paid at the time the bufinefs is done, this fum, though received in the year 1780, may include fees that accrued in a preceding year; it certainly does not include the fees for all the bufinefs done by him in that year; the remitters had not paid him their fees upon the warrants for the remittances iffued to them after the month of Febrary, 1780; and it appears from an account of those reinlitiances, extracted from the account of the extraordinary fervices incurred by the paymalter-general of the forces for the year 1780, that the fum islued to them between the 1st of March, and the 31ft of December, in that year, was 2,312,830l.; the fees upon which being at the rate of ons guinea  $N_{z}$ guinea by the thoufand pounds, amount to 2,42/l. 12s. and being divided equally between the cafhier and accountant, would have added 1,213l. 16s. to the receipt of each, and would have increated that of the caffiler to $,3891.155.6d.

The falary of the accountant is 150l. a year, reduced by the one fhilling duty to 1-21. ios. He received in fees 1,3;81. 17s. 9d. ; which, added to his falary, makes his clear receipt to have been 1,501l. 7s. 9d. Had the remitters paid all their fees, it had been increased by the addition of to the fum of 1,2131. 165. 2,7151. 38. 9d.

The ledger - keeper's falary is 10cl. a year, befides which, he receives annually Sol. from the computer of off-reckonings, and 1001. from the cafhier of half-pay : his fees amounted to 3941. 16s. making, all together, 6741. 16s. He paid out of this fum, for taxes, f.fteen pounds; to his deputy eighty pounds; and to another affiliant fifty pounds; together, 14;1. which reduced his net receipt to 529l. 16s. The prefent ledger-keeper has, by reafon of his age and infirmities, executed his office by deputy, ever fince his appointment in 1765.

The computer of off-reckonings has no other falary but that of eighty pounds, which he pays to the ledger-keeper; his net profits arole from his fees, which amounted to 1,0381. 55. 6d.

The cafnier of half-pay receives eighty pounds a year folary; the total of his fees was 6171. 5s.; together, 6971.5s .; out of which he paid, for taxes, fourteen pounds, and to the ledger-keeper one hundred pounds; this reduced his clear receipt to 5831. 55.

Sixty pounds is the falary of the entering-clerk, which, with 1.448l. 153. 4d. received by fees, made his grofs receipt 1,5081. 155. 4d. : reduced, by 101. 102. paid for taxes, to 1,4981. 58. 4d.

The other clerks are paid from fifty to one hundred pounds a-year, according to their flations and employments in the office, and receive no fees or gratuities whatever.

The deputy paymatters abroad are paid an allowance, fix of them thirty Gillings a day, and three of them three pounds a day.

The fees received by thefe officers are as various as the bufinefs they execute; each has fees pecu-liar to his branch: they confift, fome of them, of a poundage upon the funis contained in warrants brought for payment, and in receipts; others, of certain fums per regiment, paid either annually or upon tranfacting particular branches of the regimental bufinefs; others of them are certain fums for reports, certificates, receipts, entries, or other articles of official business.

The gratuities are voluntary donations upon the payment of warrants, or for creating fome trouble to the office; and are given to officers of the department where the bilfinefs is transacted.

It appears from the account of the payments made by the paymaf. ter-general, out of the deductions of twelve-p ace in the pound, and one day's pay, for the year 1780, that the falary and allowances to the paymafter-general (except the twent: fhillings a-day on the flaff) and the two additional falaries to the deputy and cafhier, and the allowances to the deputy-paymatters ibroad, are paid out of the deductions of twelve-pence in the pound ; the twenty fhillings a day on the ftaff, is paid to him, in like manner as the general and staff-officers in Great Britain are paid, out of the money granted for the ordinary fervices of the army : all these payments are therefore a charge upon the public. The paymatter-general himfelf pays the other falaries, out of the fum of 1,760l. allowed him for that purpofe. The fees and gratuities are paid by the remitters, contractors, agents, and perfons whofe bufinefs brings them to the office, and therefore come immediately out of their pockets, though much the greatest part of them ultimately fall upon the public.

Ufage of office is the general ground upon which these feveral payments reft, except in the two instances of the additional allowances to the deputy and the cafhier, which are founded on fpecial circumitances. The five hundred pounds a year addition to the deputy, is paid to him by a warrant, dated 18th March, 1774; it commenced on the 10th October, 1771, and is to continue as long as he The ground holds this office. flated in the warrant is, that the then emoluments of the office were not an adequate compendation for his trouble, care, and fidelity : his predecessions in this office had not this additional falary; for they enjoyed, at the fame time, what the prefent deputy had not, other appointments under the crown.

The warrant for the payment of the additional two hundred and feventy pounds a year to the cathier, is dated the 10th of July, 1765, and flates it to be made to him for his trouble, care, diligence, and fidelity, in the execution of the bufinefs committed to his charge.

The allowance to the paymaftergeneral of twenty shillings a day upon the flaff, is voted annually upon the effablifiment, and, together with the twenty shillings a day as treasurer of Chelsea hospital, is inferted in his letters-patent : all the falaries and allowances paid to him are fuch as have been allowed to his predeceffors in this office; and all the falaries, fees, and gratuities, received by the officers and clerks, and deputy-paymafters, are the fame as have been paid to, and received by, those who have gone before them.

From the account in the appendix it appears, that the grofs amount of the emoluments received in this office, was 25,1081.195.1d.; the net amount was 23,5611.15.8d. The furn of 13,4501. received for falaries and allowances, was paid by the public: the furn of 11,5731.195.1d. for fees and gratuities, was paid by individuals.

There is moreover another gratuity given to the officers and clerks in each of thefe pay-offices, upon pailing the final accounts of a treafurer and paymatter-general in the office of the auditor of the imprest. This gratuity is craved of the commiffioners of the treasury, by a memorial from the refpective officers and clerks in each office, as a compenfation for their trouble in carrving on and making up the accounts of a treasurer and paymafter-general after his refignation. The quantum of it bears fome proportion to the total fum contained in the account to be paffed. It is allowed to them by a treafury-warrant, out of the balance remaining in the hands of the accountant, and is therefore paid out of a public fund. These allowances have been made ever fince the Revolution, and, by the accounts of them from that period, transmitted to us from these offices, it appears, that in the payoffice of the navy, the inflances of these gratuities, from the year 1683 to the year 1772, when the last accounts of Mr. Dodington, ending in the year 1756, were passed, are feventeen, and amount to 54,1621. 178. 9Hd. And in the pay-office of the army, the inflances from the fame year, to the year 1770, when the accounts of lord Darlington, and others, ending 24th June, 1757, were paffed, are nine, and amount to 45, 112l. 18:.; making together 100,2751.155.94d. paid by the public during that period, in these gratuities.

In the Exchequer, fix offices came under our examination; namely, the auditor of the receipt, the clerk of the pells, the tellers, the chamberlains, the uther, and the paymafters of exchequer bills. There are fome circumftances common to them all; falaries or allowances, fees, and gratuities, are the heads under which may be ranged the profits of all the officers and clerks.

The gratuities are ufual voluntary donations, either from public offices or individuals: the yearly accounts are made up to Michaelmas eve ; and therefore the accounts of the receipts and payments for the year 1780, which is the year we are enquiring into, are made up to the Michaelmas of that year.

In the first five of these offices, the principal appoints the deputy and clerks. The first four of them have tables hung up in each office, by which their fees are regulated; thefe fees confift either of a poundage, or of certain payments for particular articles of bufinefs transfacted in each office, and are paid by the perfons either paying in, or receiving money out of the exchequer, or a plying for their particular bufinefs.

The return made to our precept by the duke of Newcattle, auditor of the reccipt of his majefty's exchequer, and the examinations of Edward Wilford, efq. his fift clerk, and of Mr. William Jones, the tally-writer, fupplied us with a knowledge of the flate of the emoluments received by the officers and clerks in this branch of the Exchequer, the bufinefs of which is tranfacted by the auditor and twenty-three fixed clerks, with other occafional affiftants when wanted.

The auditor is appointed for life, by a conflictution under the hands and feals of the commillioners of the treafury. All the exchequer bills, orders, debentures, patents, and other inftruments which pafs this office, are figned by him ; the official profits are not received by himfelf, but by his first clerk, who accounts with him for them every month : he receives eleven annual allowances, enumerated in an account transmitted to us, and inferted in the appendix, amounting to 3,7661. 1s. : he has a fmall annual fee from the wardrobe, of 4!. 17s.; and is entitled to fees on the receipt of money into, and iffue of money out of the Exchequer; the first amounted to 1701. 13s. 9d. the latter, 01 12,5541. 2s. 6d. The fum he received by fees for entering patents, and upon imprest bills, was 391.5%

391.5s. and in gratuities 3451.7s.; the groß amount of all which was 16,8801.6s. 3d. Out of which fum he made the following paynients: for taxes, 8721.12s.; to clerks, 1,6621.10s.; for incidental expences of office, 3291.2d.; together, 2,8641.2s.2d.; which reduced his clear receipt to 14,0161.4s.1d.

The first clerk has an annual allowance of 1001. and the clerk's fecs, amounting to 3,0011.16s.8d.; his gratuities were, 1421. 17s.; making, together, 3,2441.13s.8d.; reduced, by payments for taxes, clerks, and incidental expences, to 2,7521. 3s. 6d.

The reft of the clerks have falaries, in proportion to their rank and employment, paid to them either by the auditor, or his firft or other clerks: they have fees likewife and gratuities of various kinds; and out of what they receive, make various payments. An account of all which, as tranfmitted to us from this office, is inferted in the appendix.

The foundation of thefe allowances and fees, and the authority under which they are claimed and paid, are as follows:

Upon the king's acceffion, a certificate is transmitted from the auditor's office to the treasury, purfuant to their requisition, confifting of two lists; one containing the feveral fees, falaries, and allowances, that have by ancient custom, letters patent, constitutions, or other authorities, been paid to the officers and ministers of the Exchequer, either in right of their offices or employments, or in reward for their fervice; the other containing the fees, falaries, or allowances, that have been for-tled and allowed them for their labour and expence in managing and performing the business of the annuities payable at the Exchequer. This certificate is fent back to the Exchequer, annexed to a warrant directed to the auditor, authorifing him to draw orders or pass debentures for paying, from time to time, in the usual manner, and at the accustomed times, to the officers, the fums in the certificate mentioned; the first lift, amounting to 1,801l. 9s. out of the money applicable to his majesty's civil government; the other, amounting to 5,900!. Out of the respective funds applicable to the payment of the annuities.

This warrant flates the authority, under which the treafury iffued it, to be, as to the firft lift, either the letters patent, conflictions, or authorities, whereby the officers hold their employments, or the general letters patent dormant (by which the king empowers them to make variety of payments, therein defcribed, out of the civil lift); and, as to the fecond lift, either the powers given to them by the refpective acts of parliament relative to annuities, or any other power in them being.

In this certificate are contained the eleven allowances made to the auditor: the two first of them, amounting to 460l. 3s. 4d. are in the first litt, and paid to him in right of his office: the other nine, making 3,3051. 17s Sd. are in the fecond list, and paid to him as a recompence for his trouble in the business of the annuities, by virtue of the power vested in the treasfury by the feveral acts, to provide for the charges of management.

The fees of the auditor, upon the N 4 receipt reccipt of moncy, are : 1ft, about one fourth part of the tally-court fces; of which fourth, his clerk attending in the tally-court has a fhare : 2 ily, part of a fum allowed by the treafury to fome of the exchequer officers for the tallies of loan which are exempt from fces.

The fees upon the iffue are, a poundage upon money iffued for certain fervices, not for all fervices. In the year 1780, the fum on which the poundage fees were paid was near eight millions : upwards of twenty-two millions more were issued in that year, for which neither the auditor nor his clerks received any fees whatever. The other fees are, certain payments for transacting particular kinds of All these fees are rebufinefs. gulated by a table, fpecifying, both for the auditor and his clerks, the rate, where it is a poundage, otherwife the quantum, of each fee: this table is for the molt part grounded upon ulage, recognifed as ancient by the barons of the Exchequer in the year 1692, as to those fees the subject matter of which existed at that time; and acquiefced in, as to those fees the fubject matter of which is of a date fubfequent to that year.

By an act, passed in the 3d year of William and Mary, the officers of the Exchequer were prohibited from taking any other fees, for the receiving or islung the supplies granted by that or any other act of parliament, except such ancient and legal fees as should be allowed to be fo by the barons of the court of Exchequer; who were required to prefent to both houses of parliament, at the next feffions, a table of fees, to be by them allowed as ancient and legal. The barons, in purfuance of this power, made a report, containing the table required: this report is enrolled in the office of the king's remembrancer: a copy of it is inferted in the appendix; it comprehends the fees to be taken upon the reccipt and iffue of money in the offices of the auditor, the clerk of the pells, the tellers, and the tally court; and is the rule, though the act is long fince expired, by which they are governed at this day, except in fome few inftances, where ulage, fince that report, has introduced variations; one of which is, by the barous report the whole of the fees paid to the officers of the Exchequer, upon the iffue of money for the army fervices in general, was three halfpence in the pound; but, ever fince the year 1744, a difference has been made between the iffue for the ordinary and extraordinary fervices; the fees for the first continue at three halfpence; those for the latter are reduced to one penny only in the pound.

These payments come out of different funds. The two first allowances to the auditor, the treafury allowance for the tallies of loan, the wardrobe fee, and the allowance to the first clerk, which is included in the first list of the Exchequer certificate, are paid out of the civil lift; the other nine allowances are paid out of the funds created by the feveral acts, and therefore out of the public money. The fees of the tallycourt, and from iffues, and for other bufiness, are paid immediately by individuals; but all the Exchequer fees paid on the iffues for the army fervices, amounting, in the year 1780, to 39,198]. 75. 10d.

7s. 10d. are charged by the paymaker general of the forces upon the deductions of twelve-pence in the pound, and therefore paid by the public. Of the fum of 7,980,340l. on the iflue of which fees were paid, 7,311,732l. part thereof, was money belonging to the public; 668,608l. other part, was out of the civil lift.

From the account in the appendix, it appears, that the total fum received in this office, was 21,2731. 16s.; the net fum was 19,8801. 16s. 4d.: the fum of 13,7081. 12s. 1d. was paid by the public; 1,1161. 7s. 5d. out of the civil lift; and 6,4481. 16s. 6d. by individuals.

From the return made to us by the right hon. Sir Edward Walpole, clerk of the pells, and the examinations of Edward Roberts, efq. his deputy and first clerk, and Mr. Henry Thomas, clerk of the introitus, we learned the flate of the profits received by the officers and clerks in this office; which office confists of the clerk of the pells, his deputy and first clerk, and fourteen inferior clerks.

The clerk of the pells is appointed for life, by a conflication under the hands and feals of the commiffioners of the treasury, to exercise his office either by himfelf or deputy. In confequence of this privilege, it has not been ufual, for many years, for the clerk of the pells to execute any part of the bufinefs himfelf; the deputy transacts the whole, and receives and accounts with his principal for all the profits that belong to him. The clerk of the pells receives thirteen diffinct allowances, fet forth in the return, amounting to 1,603l. os. 11d. paid to him by order or debenture. One of them, 611. 13s. 4d. is inferted in his conflitution, and is, together with fix more, making 3061. 1s. 8d. included in the first list in the Exchequer certificate, and therefore payable out of the civil lift: the remaining fix, amounting to 1,2351. 58. 11d. are in the fecond lift, and therefore payable out of the refpective annuity funds. His fees upon the receipt confift of about onefourth part both of the tally-court fees and of the treafury allowance for the tallies of loan; a certain part of both of which is appropriated to his clerk of the introitus. His fhare of thefe fees and allowances came to 1941. 58.  $10\frac{1}{2}$ d. His fees on the isfue are, like those of the auditor, a poundage, at different rates for different fervices, paid by the perfons receiving, according to a table hung up in the office, taken, and varying but little from the barons report; and according to the fame table, some ancient fees are taken for the entries, enrollments, and examinations of certain instruments. All the above fees amounted to 7,700l. 2s. 8d. and his gratuities from the public offices, to 551. 1s.; which made his groß receipt 9,432l. 1s.  $6\frac{1}{2}d$ .: out of which he paid 1,8341. 95. 6d. The particulars of thefe payments are flated in a return inferted in the appendix, and reduced his clear receipt to 7,597l. 128. c<sup>I</sup>d.

The deputy and first clerk has a falary of 4201 a year paid to him by his principal: his fees are, a poundage upon one head of iffue only, that is, the iffue on annuities, penfions, &c. at the rate finted in the barons report; and alfo fome other fmall fees and grituities enumerated in the account of the officers and clerks fees in the appendix, amounting to 2831. 6s. 1d. Takte two two fums were reduced, by the payment of 221. for taxes, to the net fum of 6811. 6s. rd.

The clerk of the introitus has a fhare of the tally-court fees, and of the treafury allowance, and fome other fmall fees, allowances, and gratuities; the whole producing 3481, 95,  $9\frac{1}{2}d$ .; reduced, by 91, 75. for taxes, to 3391, 23,  $9\frac{1}{2}d$ .

The reft of the clocks have falaries, from 50l. to 120l. paid them by the principal, and a few of them tome fmall fees and gratuities.

From a flate of the total received and paid in this office, the fum received was 10,269l. 19s.  $2\frac{1}{2}d$ .; the net fum 9,543l. 13s.  $9\frac{1}{2}d$ .: the fum paid by the public, 5,964l. 4s. 9d.; out of the civil lift, 752l. 1s.  $2\frac{1}{3}d$ .; and from individuals, 3,553l. 13s. 2d.

From the return made to our precept, and the examinations of Daniel Wray, William Price, Richard Welles, and Charles Townfhend, efqrs, the deputies and first clerksof the right hon, earl of Hardwicke, the earl of Northington, earl Temple, and the hon. John Jeffreys Pratt, the four tellers of the Exchequer, we obtained an account of the emoluments received in this effice.

The tellers is one office in four divisions; each confifting of a teller, a deputy and first clerk, two offices executed by the fame perfon, a fecond clerk, and three inferior clerks; in all twenty-four perfons. The teller is appointed for life, by letters patent, which empower him to execute the office by deputy; and therefore the whole businefs of thefe offices is now, and long has been, transacted entirely by deputies. The teller himfelf executes no part of it; he does not collect his own profits; they are received and accounted for to him by his deputy.

Each teller receives yearly an ancient falary or fee belonging to his office; the fenior 331.6s. 8d. the three juniors 311. 135. 4d. each. They have likewife fix annual allowances from the treafury for their trouble in paying the annuities, which are equally divided among the four : the fhare of each is 3301. Thefe falaries and al-14s. 11. lowances are in the Exchequer certificate; the falaries in the first list, the allowances in the fecond. The tellers are paid nothing upon the receipt of money; their fees arife from the iffue, and confift of a poundage on iffues, not for all, but for certain fervices, and different for different fervices, according to rates fpecified in the table of fees flated in the return, and taken from the barons report, but varying from it in the rate on the iffues for the extraordinaries of the army, as before mentioned, and on the iffues for penfions, and fome other fervices, which, though fubject to fees in that report, are fince exempted by acts of parliament. These fees are divided equally amongst the four tellers; and the fhare of each was 7,038. 158.  $0\frac{1}{2}$ d. The fum, on the iffue of which these fees were taken, was near 16,000,000l.: the fum, for which no fees were taken, was upwards of 14,000,000l. as being exempt either by acts of parliament, courtefy, or usage. The fum subject to fees in the office of the tellers exceeds the fum fubject to fees in the offices of the auditor, and clerk of the pells; for the barons report makes the lum iffued to the navy, (which in the year 1780 exceeder exceeded 6,000,000l.) and to the ordnance, liable in the one, and not in the other. The falary, and onefourth part of the allowances and fees, which conflitute the grofs receipt of the first teller, amounted to 7,409l. 17s.  $1\frac{3}{4}d$ ; out of which he paid for clerks, taxes, gratuities, and incidental expences, 713l. 5s.  $4\frac{1}{4}d$ ; the remainder, being his net receipt, was 6,696l. 11s.  $9\frac{1}{4}d$ .

The grofs receipt of the fecond teller, confiding of the like articles, and alfo of 401. for the rent of a houle belonging to his office, was 7,4501. 2s.  $5\frac{3}{4}d$ .: his payments for clerks, taxes, and incidents, were 7721. 16s. 6d.; which left him a net receipt of 6,6771. 5s.  $11\frac{3}{4}d$ .

The grois receipt of the third teller, was the like fum: his payments were 7421. 17s.; which left him a clear balance of 6,7071. 5s.  $5\frac{3}{4}$ d.; but the third teller, taking to himfelf a portion of his first clerk's fees, amounting to 1,1081. 15s. 7d. and all his fecond clerk's fees (deducting the taxes), being 1,3371. 2s. 1d. his net receipt was 9,1531. 3s.  $1\frac{3}{4}$ d.

The profits of the office of the fourth teller, (which were divided between Mr. Townfhend, the late teller, or his executors, and Mr. Pratt, who fucceeded to this office May 21, 1780) were 7,5111. 3s.  $7\frac{3}{4}$ d.: the deductions were 7711. os. Id.; which reduced the clear receipt to 6,7401.3s. $6\frac{3}{4}$ d. The articles compoing thefe feveral receipts and deductions, and thofe which follow relative to the clerks, are enumerated in the return tranfmitted to us from this office.

The deputy, as fuch, has no profit whatever; but, as first clerk, he has fees both upon the receipt and issue: the fees upon the receipt are called bill-money, and are in confideration of his writing the bills: they are paid according to an ancient table of fees ufed in the office, and flated in the return; not included in the barons report, becaufe that report relates to the fupplies granted by that parliament only. This bill-money is divided equally among the four first clerks; the fhare of each was 1821. 95.

The fees upon the iffue are, a poundage, after a certain rate, for certain fervices, according to the barons report, fimilar to that of the tellers, with the like variations and exemptions : thefe fees are divided into eight equal parts, and belong to the four first and the four fecond clerks; the eighth part or fhare of each was 1,3791. 125. 1d. Each first clerk receives also annually, in gratuities from public offices, 461. Thefe articles, of bill-money, 4s. fees, and gratuities, making together 1,6081. 58. 1d. was the grofs receipt of the first clerks to the three junior tellers. The first clerk to the fenior teller received more; he had the allowance of 3391. 14s. and 230l. out of the fees of the fecond clerk, in confideration of his paying the falaries of the three under clorks, and as an additional recompence for his care and trouble in the execution of his office. These fums increafed his grofs receipt to 2, 1771. 19s. 1d.: out of which he paid in taxes, for clerks, and other expences, 4571. 1s. reducing thereby his net receipt to 1,7201.18s.1d. The first clerk to the fecond teller reduced his receipt of 1,608l. 5s. id. by the payment of 511. 14s. for taxes and incidental expences, to 1,556l. 11s. 1d. The first cierk to the third tellor paid in taxes and gratuities 531.58.6d.; the remaining íum. fum of 1,554l. 198. 7d. he did not retain to his own use: he is allowed by his teller, for the execution of this office, a falary of 400l. a year, and the gratuities of 461. 4s.; thefe he retains; but the refidue, being 1,10Sl. 15s. 7d. he paid to the third teller. The first clerk to the fourth teller paid out of his receipt 531.58. 6d. for taxes and gratuities, and, in addition to the falary of the fenior under clerk, 37l. 12s. of d. being at the rate of 100l. a year, from the 21ft of May, the time of Mr. Pratt's appointment, to Michaelmas 1780. Thefe payments reduced his clear receipt to 1,5171. 7s. 63d.

The only profit appropriated to the office of the fecond clerk, is the eighth part of the fees on the iffues, which was 1,379l. 128. 1d. The fecond clerks to the first, fecond, and third tellers, never attend the office, or transact any official bufinefs whatever; the first clerk receives the fnare of the fees belonging to the fecond, makes the ufual payments out of it, and pays the refidue to fuch perfon as the teller has named as his fecond clerk, or otherwife to the teller himfelf. The payments out of the fhare of the fecond clerk to the first teller, were 42l. 15s. for taxes and incidents, and 230l. to the first clerk ; the remainder, being 1,106l. 17s. 1d. was paid to the father of the fccoud clerk, who was under age.

Forty-two pounds fifteen fhillings was the deduction out of the fees of the second cle: k to the fecond teller: the remaining fum of 1,336l. 17s. Id. was paid to the fecond clerk. The fhare of the fecond clerk to the third teller was reduced, by the payment of 42l. 10% for taxes, to 1,337l. 2s. 1d. the whole of which was paid to the third teller himfelf.

The fecond clerk in the remaining division has been in a fituation different from the reft. During the time Mr. Townshend was teller, his fecond clerk attended the business of the office, who received the fees belonging to the fecond clerk, fubject only to the payment of the taxes; there were then but two clerks more employed : the fhare of thefe fees that accrued in Mr. Townfhend's life-time was 801l. 2s. 1d.; out of which 261. 103. 6d. the proportion of taxes, being paid, the remaining 774l. 11s. 7d. was the net receipt of the fecond clerk to Mr. Townshend. The fecond clerk appointed by the prefent teller has never attended; but, out of his fees, the fenior of the under clerks, who was fecond clerk to Mr. Townfhend, is allowed 400l. a year: his fhare of the fees for the remainder of the year, was 5781. 105.; out of which was paid 151. 19s. 6d. for taxes, and 1501. Ss.  $2\frac{3}{4}d$ , being fo much of the falary of 4001. as accrued between the time the teller was appointed and the Michaelmas following; the remainder, being 412l. 2s. 34d. was paid to the father of the teller.

The under clerks are paid by fuch falaries as each teller thinks proper to allow them : they have no fees; but receive fome fmall gratuities, amounting in the year to about 20l. to each division.

An account of the receipts and payments in this office flews the grofs receipt to be 41,772l. 145. 5d. and the net, 38,138l. 13s.  $2\frac{3}{4}d.$ : 29,272l. 3s. 4d. is paid out of public money; 1,024l. 9s. out of the civil lift; and 11,476l. 2s. 1d. by individuals.

A return was made to our precept from the chamberlain's office. We examined examined Abraham Farley and William Hammond, efqrs. deputies on the receipt fide, and James Galloway and George Rofe, efqrs. deputies on the court fide, to Montague Burgoyne, efq. and the hon. Frederick North, the two chamberlains of the Exchequer. We received alfo a return from Thomas Lambe, efq. tally-cutter, and examined Mr. Charles Alexander, his doputy.

This office confifts of three divisions; the receipt fide, or taily court; the court fide; and the taily-cutter's office: it is composed of nine perfons; namely, the two chaniberlains, two deputies on each fide, one under clerk ou the court fide, the tally-cutter, and bis deputy.

The office of chamberlain is held for life by letters patent, with power to execute it by deputy. By virtue of this privilege, thefe two officers interfere not in any part of the bufiness of this office; it is all transacted on both fides by the deputies. Each chamberlain is entitled to wo annual payments, a failary of 521. 3s. 4d. reduced by taxes to 46l. 17s.; and 13l. 6s. 6d. wardrobemoney, reduced by fees to 111. 195. 10d.; together, clear, 581. 16s. 10d. The two falaries are in the first lift of the Exchequer certificate; the wardrobe-money is a cottomary payment. They receive neither fee nor gratuity; but they take to themfelves a part of the profits of both their deputies. The fenior chamberlain received, out of the fees of his deputy on the receipt fide, 70l. and out of the fees of his deputy on the court fide, 2561.6s. 10d. which increased his net profits to 3851.35. 3d. The junior chamberlain received, out of the profits of his deputy on the receipt-fide, 252l. 58.

22. and on the court-fide, 2741. 6s. 10d.; which made his clear receipt 5851. 8s. rod.

The two deputies on the receipt fide have each of them ancient falaries ; the fenior four, amounting to 971. a year; the junior three, together, 571. a-year : the first list of the Exchequer certificate contains them all : they are also entitled, in equal moieties, to one-fourth part (with fome trifting exceptions) of the fees taken in the tally-court; of which the fhare of each deputy was 1931.17s.5d. : each of them received a treafury allowance for the tallies of loan, 701.138.3d. and from the paymafter-general of the forces, a gratuity of 31. 138. 6d. Thefe feveral items produced to the fenior, 3651. 4s. 2d. reduced, by the payment of 181. 18s. 6d. for taxes, and 70l. to his principal, to the clear fum of 2761.5s.Sd.; and produced to the junior, 3251.4s. 2d. reduced, by the payment of 181. 155. 6d. for taxes, to 3061.8s.8d.; of which fur he retained to his own use a falary of 501, allowed him by his principal for the execution of the office, the gratuity of 31. 135. 6d. and a fum of about ten thillings more, making, together, 541. 3s. 6d. ; the remainder, being 252l. 5s. 2d. he puid to his principal.

An ancient table regulates the fees taken in the tilly-court, and effimates them, either by the tally, or by the fum paid in: they are received from the perfons who take away the tallies, and are divided for the moft part into four equal pertions, one of which belongs to the auditor and his clerk, another to the clerk of the pells and his clerk, a third to the two deputy chamberlains on the receipt-fide, and the fourth to the tally-cutter.

The

The two deputies on the court fide have each an ancient falary of five pounds a-year, inferted in the first list of the Exchequer certificate; and are entitled, in equal moleties, to fees paid by accountants for joining tallies, according to an ancient table, and effimated either by the tally, or the fum to be accounted for; the moiety of these fees was 2611. 7d. and of the treafury allowance for the tallies of loan, Sol. 18s. 9d.; together, to each deputy, 352l. 19s. 4d.: out of this fum, the deputy to the fenior chamberlain paid 161. 2s. 6d. for taxes, and three pounds for incidental expences; which reduced the clear receipt to 3331. 16s. 10d. : of this fum he retained 651. as his falary for the execution of the office, and 121. 103. for the under clerk; the refidue, being 2561.6s. 10d. he paid to his principal. The like thare of the deputy to the junior, was reduced, by the like payments for taxes, and 12l. 10s. to the clerk, to 3241. ús. 10d.: out of which, retaining his falary of 50l. he paid the remaining 274l. 0s. 10d. to his principal. The under clerk has only a falary of 251. a-year, paid to him out of the fees of the deputies.

The tally-cutter is appointed by conditution from the commiftioners of the treafury, during pleafure: he executes no part of the bufinefs of this office himfelf; his deputy tranfacts the whole of it: he has a falary of 51. 10s. a year, inferted in the firlt lift of the Exchequercertificate, and received an allowance from the treafury for the loan tallies of 1411. 6s. 6d.; which two fums are paid out of the civil lift: his fourth of the tally-court fees amounted to 3661. 7s. 103. Thefe fums, making together 5131. 4s. 4d. were reduced, by 141. 12s. 9d. paid for taxes, and 571. 1s. 3d. allowed to his deputy, to 4411. 10s. 4d. clear receipt. The deputy, in addition to his falary, received from the ufter 11. 10s. for grinding tools, and 11. 3s. 6d. in gratuities; which made his net receipt 591. 14s. 9d.

The grofs charge of this office, comprehending all its divisions, is 2,0431. 4s. 6d.; to which the public contributed 71. 7s.; the civil lift 7581. 10s. 2d.; and individuals, 1,2771. 7s. 4d.: the net receipt was 1,9171. 6s. 9d.

But to the expence created by this office, mult be added those portions of the tally-court fees, and the treafury allowances for the tallies of loan, paid to the auditor and the clerk of the pells, amounting together to 1,0211. 5s. included in the accounts of the profits of those offices; which, added to the groß fum of 2,0431. 4s. 6d. increases the total expence of the chamberlain's office to 3,0641. 9s. 6d.

The return of the hon. Horace Walpole, ufter of the Exchequer, and the examination of Charles Bedford, efq. his deputy, fupplied us with a flate of the emoluments of this office; in which three perfons are concerned, the ufter, the deputy, and the clerk, who is alfo yeoman ufter.

The uther is appointed for life, by letters patent, with power to exercife this office by deputy; which power it has been ufual for the uther to make ufe of; and confequently the bufinefs of this office is tranfacted entirely by the deputy. The uther receives leveral imail halfyearly fees or payments, on different accounts, enumerated in the resurn, and amounting in the year to 401. 178. 8d.; but his principal advantage is the profit he makes, by fupplying the Treafury and Exchequer with stationary and turnery ware, and feveral other articles, and the Exchequer with coals, and by employing the workmen who do the repairs of the Exchequer and the infide of the Treafury. There is an ancient table kept in the offices of the auditor and the ufher, which contains a long catalogue of the articles furnished by the usher, and a certain price affixed to each article : the ufher is allowed, and charges government, for each article he furnishes, at the rate stated in this table : but this table does not contain all the items he provides; for fuch as are not included in it, he is allowed a profit of forty per cent. and on the workmen's bills for repairs he has a profit of 3s. 6d. in the pound. The total of these gains was 5,2521. 8s. 44d. and, with his fees, made his groß receipt 5,2931. 6s.  $o_{\overline{x}}^{1}d$ . His deductions were, for taxes, 4761. 5 d.; to his deputy a falary of 1441, and one-third of the poundage on the bills for repairs, 2341. 4s. 6d.; to the clerk a falary of 501, and to him as ycoman uther 361.8s. 3d.; in fees 461. 185.; and for incidental expences, 1051. 148. 10d. The amount of these deductions is 1,0931.6s.04d: and reduced his net receipt to 4,200l.

The deputy received, in fees from the flationers, and others, 1451. 58. 11d. which, added to his falary, and poundage on the workmen's bills, made 5231. 108. 5d.; from which, 41. being deducted for taxes, his net receipt was 5191. 108. 5d. 'The clerk received, in gratuities, 761. 18. which, with his falary from the uther, made 1261. 18. As yeoman uther, he there was no deduction. Hence the groß expence of this office was  $5,5371, 15^{s}, 5^{T}_{4}d$ ; the net, 4,9051.  $2^{s}, 2^{d}$ . The public contributed 1,0071. 6s.  $8^{T}_{4}d$ ; the civil lift, 4,2851, 195, 4d; and individuals, 2441. 95, 5d.

By the return transmitted to us from the office of the paymatters of Exchequer bills, and from the examination of Nathaniel Barwell, efq. one of the paymatters, we obtained the information following:

This office is executed by three paymasters, a comptroller, an accountant, a caffier, and two clerks; to which are added, a house-keener and mellenger, and occasional affillant clerks. The paymasters, the comptroller, and the houfe-keeper, are appointed by the commillioners of the treafery, by constitution, during pleafure; the reft of the of [ ficers are appointed by the pay-malters themfelves. This office is diffinguished from the reft, in that the officers, as well as the clerks, are all paid by falaries only. No fee or gratuity whatever is taken by any of them, except a finall annual fee of 21. 78. allowed the accountant for making up his year's Lach paymatter has an account. annual faiary of 2831. 65. 8.1. which has not varied fince the year 1736: he pays, for himielf and clerks, 341. 3s. 4d. for taxes; which reduces it to 2491. 35. 4d. The comptroller's falary is 3501. a. year; reduced, by the payment of 411. 10s. for taxes, to 3031. 10s. The filaries of the reil are paid clear of deductions, as stated in the return: all of them together aniount mount to 1,620l. which is paid out of the public funds.

From the account of the contingent expences of this office, they were 1691. 17s. 7d. paid alfo by the public; fo that the grofs expence of this office to the public, was 1,7921. 4s. 7d.; the net produce to the officers, was 1,4781. 7s.

That the total amount of the expences attending the receiving and isfuing of the public money at the receipt of his majefty's Exchequer, may appear at one view, we fubjoin, in the appendix, an account of the totals of the grofs and net receipt by the officers and clerks in each of these branches of the Exchequer, with the deductions paid thereout during the year 1780. From whence it appears, the groß fam received by all of them, in falaries, fees, and gratuities, was 82,5191. 165. 62d.; and the net fum 75,8631. 198. 34d. The fum of 51,751l. 18s. 54d. was paid by the public; 8,0081.  $5d\frac{1}{2}$ . out of the civil lift; 22,929!. 15s. 3d. by individuals; and 3,8671. 12s. 54d. for taxes.

Such is the flate of the falaries, fees, and gratuities; and fuch the authority under which they are baid and received in these offices. But the act enjoins us a still farther duty; it commands us " to report fuch regulations, as, in our judgment, shall appear expedient to be established, in order that the duties, taxes, and monies, granted, received, and appropriated for the public fervice of this kingdom, may hereafter be received and iffued in the manner the most beneficial and advantageous to the public."

Regulations to this end have, in the progrefs of this enquiry, offered themfelves to our judgment; regulations tending to introduce that fvstem of strift æconomy in the administration of the public revenue, which the legislature has, by the act, determined to be necessary. By " ftrift cconomy," we apprehend, is not meant fuch as either derogates from the honour and dignity of the crown, or abridges the fervant of the public of the due reward of his industry and abilities; we mean an economy that fleers between extreme parfimony on the one hand, and profusion on the other; that is confiftent with juffice as well as prudence; that gives to all their full due, and to none more; that fupports every ufeful and neceffary eftablishment, but cuts off and reduces every fuperfluous and redundant expence. Some regulations, built upon the principle of economy thus defined, have for their objects the offices, the officers, and their emoluments.

An office of the higheft antiquity, that has fubfilted for ages under its prefent form; that has the receipt and cuffody of the public treafure, upon the due administration of which depends the national credit and fafety of the realm; an office of fuch a defeription is entitled to the utmost respect, and alterations in its eftablishment should be well weighed, and proposed with caution and diffidence: but, as a change in the manners, cuftoms, and, above all, in the finances of this nation, fince the origin of this office, together with peculiar circumfiances of the times, may render regulations necessary, we have judged it a part of our duty to examine into the receipt of the Exchequer, with a view to an œconomical reform.

The office of the chamberlains of the Exchequer, however important portant in ancient times, is, at this day, occupied principally in the bufinefs of the tally; which is the official acquittance to perfons paying money into the Exchequer. This acquittance has various formalities, all calculated to prevent the poffibility of a forgery, by which the accountant might, on paffing his accounts, be difcharged of a fum he never paid.

The teller is obliged, as foon as he receives money, to transmit the bill by which he charges himfelf with that receipt, through the pipe into the tally court; where the following officers attend : 1ft, the tallywriter; who is the officer of the auditor, and takes an account of the fum, and writes it on both fides of the tally delivered to him, with the fum cut upon it in notches by the tally-cutter. zdly. The clerk of the introitus; who is the officer of the pells, and records the receipt: and 3dly, the two deputy chamberlains on the receipt-fide; who fplit the tally, examine and compare the two parts with each other, and with the entry made by the clerk of the introitus. The tally is delivered to the accountant; the foil is delivered to, and kept by, the deputy chamberlains on the court-fide, until the accountant, being about to pass his accounts, brings to them the account of his payments into the Exchequer, with the tallies : thefe chamberlains examine the account, join the tallies with the foils, mark both, certify upon the account that the tallies are received and joined, deliver back his account to the accountant, keep the foil in the office, and fend the tally to the clerk of the pipe. In this operation nine perfons are concerned.

VOL. XXVIII.

It is undoubtedly true, that the public revenue cannot be too fafely guarded againfi fraud of every kind : but if a mode of receipt can be fubflituted, fimilar to what is practifed in other offices, equally fecure, and at but little expence, fuch a mode demands attention.

If, inflead of the tally court, the clerks of the auditor, and of the pells, were to attend the office of the tellers, as the bank clerk does now, and take an account of the fums, as they are received; if an indented check receipt of each fumwas made out, compared with the entries, and marked with an intratur by the one officer, and a recordatur by the other; if this receipt was produced with the account, before it is paffed and examined with the counterfoil, and the account compared with the entries in the office, either of the auditor, or the pells, and the truth of it certified by that officer; a check thus fenced feems to be as effectually fecured against forgery as the tally, is a mode more fimple, and can be transacted by a fingle clerk. Nor is this check unknown in the Exchequer; the bills that are iffued every year, to a great a, mount, both in number and value, are guarded by the check indenture and counterfoil,

The other bufinels of this office may, without injury to the public, be cafily transferred elfewhere: the cuffody of one of the keys to the tellers chefts, the number of which ought not to be diminified, may he committed to the auditor; and the cuffody of the flar dard weights and measures, and of the flandard pieres of gold and filter, causing little trouble, and that but feldom, to any other office in the Exchequer.

194 ANNUAL REGISTER, 1786.

Seeing, therefore, no utility accruing to the public from the office of the chamberlains, beyond the labour of a fingle clerk, but, on the contrary, a confiderable charge incurred annually, in fupporting two chamberlains, and a tally-cutter, three finecures, at the expence, in the year 1780, of 1,412l. 25.10d.; and the whole office at the expence of 3,064l.95.6d.; we are of opinion, that public prudence requires the fuppreffion of this office, and the fublitution of another kind of receipt in the place of the tally.

The chief, if not the only, prefent duty of the usher, is to supply the Treafury and Exchequer with flationary and turnery ware, and a variety of other articles, and the Exchequer with coals, and to provide workmen for certain repairs; he is, as it were, a factor to these offices for particular necesfaries; on all which he has a profit. The amount of the four liberates, which contained all the articles provided by him, with the bills for repairs in the year 1780, was 14,4401.3s. 6d.; out of which the profits to the uther were 5,252l. 8s. 4d .: fo that, fuppoling all these articles could have been purchased, and the repairs done, as cheap without the intervention of the usher (and no reason appears why they might not) the public paid 14,4401. 3s. 6J. for what was really worth but 9,1871. 15s. 2d.; that is, near forty per cent. more than they would have paid, had no fuch office exifted as that of the ufher.

As whatever is wanted for public ufe, fhould be purchafed at the first hand, and at as cheap a rate as may be, we think it neceffary for the public interest, that the office of the usher of the Exchequer should be difcontinued, as expensive and unneceffary; and that every principal officer should procure all articles requisite for his own department, and for that purpofe be paid by the public an annual allowance proportioned to the wants of his office; a method now practifed in the paymatter-general's and in various other offices.

The teller's is one office, at the head of which are placed four officers, independent of each other, each prefiding over his own diffinct division, but none of them contributing to the execution of any part of the business. It is expedient, that in an office of this importance, fome perfon of rank and responsibility should preside, to superintend, direct, and controul, the execution, with an appointment adequate to his confequence and ffation in the official Icale, leaving to fubordinate officers and minifters the laborious detail of the execution; but no advantage is derived to the public from placing four inoperative officers at the head of this one office.

Judging then, as we muft do, folely by the rule of public frugality, and fuppofing the nation to itand in need of every practicable retrenchment, and confequently to require the reduction of every ufelets and expentive office, we are led neceffarily to conclude, that, as the public fervice receives no affittance or advantage from the labours of the tellers, and the public treafure will find a confiderable increafe from their emoluments, the public interest requires their number fhould be reduced.

Whatever reafons there may be for continuing thefe, and other offices mentioned above; whether 8 drawn drawn from policy or expedience; as a refource for the reward of fervices, in preference to penfions; or from juffice, for continuing them during the lives of the prefent poffeffors only, in favour of the rights of private property; or whether it would be proper to change them again from offices for life to offices during pleafure; all these are topics not within the limits of our commiftion, but for the difcuffion of the legiflature; whofe deliberations comprehend arguments drawn from every fource. But, in whatever fhape they may be permitted to continue, every reason of prudence demands the reduction of their emoluments, from an excefs to a reafonable limited standard.

There are likewife in this office of the tellers, four officers, under the denomination of fecond clerks, who are mercly nominal, without attendance, without bufinefs, care, or trouble; but they have fees, and to no inconfiderable amount. In the year 1780, the total of them was 5,5181. 8s. 4d. and were either paid to, or to the use of, the perfons named to thefe offices, or increafed the profits of the tellers themfelves. Whatever pretentions a fuperior officer may have to an exemption from duty and fervice, a finecure is repugnant to the idea of the condition of a clerk in office; and therefore we are of opinion, that common fenfe requires the suppression of the offices of the fecond clerks to the tellers.

We have ranged the emoluments of thefe offices under the heads of Salaries, Fees, and Gratuities. From our examination into the flate of the Salaries, many of them appear to be made up of a variety, and fometimes of very finall payments, arifing out of different funds. Of the inferior clerks, feveral pay over, either the whole or portions of their falaries, or fees, to increase the profits of other clerks; all which is contrary to that fimplicity and regularity that ought to be obferved in every office, and may be eafily corrected by a regulation we thall hereaster propofe.

The Fees are either fums paid for tranfacting particular kinds of official bufinefs, or a roundage; the first fort of fees fall, in many cafes, very heavy upon individuals: in fome cifes they fall upon the public: it would be much for the benefit of both, as well as for the honour of government, that all perfons employed in the public fervice, and who mult of necessity have recourse to offices for instructions. instruments, and other official bufinefs, effential to the execution of their employments, should be furnifhed with all neceffary materials, and have their business done in every office, without fee or reward: the regulation hereinafter fuggefted will, if adopted, be attended with this good effect.

The poundage is the moft fruitful fource of fees to moft of the fuperior, and to fome of the inferior officers; it is a payment, after fome certain rate in the pound, upon the fum received, or illued, or contained in fome official inftrument made out in the office, and delivered to the perfon applying.

In ancient times, when the tranfaction was an actual delivery of money, and that money confifted of coin of various denominations and value, and poffible clipt, or of doubtful weight, the trouble and attention of the perfor employed in the receipt or payment in-O 2 created creafed with the fum; and therefore the poundage was a mode of reward that bore a proportion to the labour: but in these times, when all money transactions are carried on, not by the medium of cash, not by the tale or weight of current coin, but by the fubftitution of paper, by cash notes, draughts, or bills, to any amount; fince the clear and concife method of the debtor and creditor account has been fo univerfally introduced to practice, an increase in the magnitude of the fums, though to a valt amount, is the addition of a few figures, or of a few entries, only; and the increase of trouble arising from it is too inconfiderable to be effimated. The examination of Mr. Cowper, who attends daily at the Exchequer on the part of the Bank, thews us with what eafe, perfpicuity, and exactness, the various and most extensive receipts and paymen's of the public revenue are transacted there, by the intervention of the Bank, with whom the principal offices of receipt, and feveral of the greater accountants, keep their cafh: the transactions there, of each day, are carried on, not in coin told or weighed by the tellers, but by the interchange of cash notes, or by the bare entries of the fumsreceived and paid; and that account being made up when the transactions of the day are finished, the balance only is either taken out of, or deposited in, the teller's chefts, in exchequer bills, or labelled bags of cafe, according as that balance turns out in favour of, or against, the Bank.

Befides this facility in conducting money transactions, a course of years has introduced, and very ragidly within these few years, another alteration, moft fenfibly felt, in this payment by poundage. In its first establishment, the revenue of this kingdom was not confiderable, and the profits of the poundage exceeded not the earnings of the officer; but in these later times, the neceffities of the flate have required a revenue far beyond the imagination of our ancestors. In the year under our contemplation, the receipt of the Exchequer was 31,821,195 l.; the isfue, 30,384,8381.: on near 16,000,0001. was a poundage paid to different branches of that office, amounting, as much of it as we could extract from the returns, and which is not the whole, to 62,225 l.; of which much the greatest part was paid to officers for transacting either very little, or no business at all. The total of the emoluments accruing in that year to the ineffective officers of the Exchequer, amounted to 45,3321.

But the excess of this poundage reaches beyond the fuperior clafs; it fwelled the profits of a fingle officer, not the principal in the department, to a fum nearly equal to what fupported an entire office of equal expenditure for the whole year. The net actual receipt of the cafhier alone, in the pay-office of the army, was 7, 1751. 198. 6d .: the net receipt of the whole pay-office of the navy was7,9331.; and it would have been inferior to that of the cafhier, had he at the time of his examination received the whole of his income for that year.

Since then, on the one hand, the improvements of the age have taken away the foundation upon which this fpecies of reward was built, it is but reafonable the fuperflructure fhould fall with it; and, on the other other hand, the exigencies of the age having converted what was defigned to be the reward of industry, into the means of rendering fome offices lucrative to excefs, and of fupporting others that are ufelefs to the public, the fubject has a right to be relieved of that burthen: and therefore we are of opinion, that all poundage fees, of every kind foever, should be suppressed, and totally abolished: and of this opinion was the privy council; who, by their order in the year 1695, above alluded to, thewed their fenfe of a poundage, by dirolling it, in instances therein mentioned, to be fupprefied in the office of the treasurer of the navy.

The remaining head is that of Gratuities; a species of encolument very liable to abufe: it may be a reward for civility, favour, or extra fervice; it may be alfo the purchafe of undue preference, expedition, and, in fome cafes, of procraftination. Flowing, at first, from the liberality of opulence, the oftentation of vanity, or the defign of cunning, it very foon affumes the name of cultom, and becomes a claim, fubmitted to, to avoid the imputation of meannefs, and frequently to the great inconvenience of contracted circumstances: nor is it confined to individuals only; the public pay their fhare: in the payments out of the deductions of twelve pence in the pound, there are two articles, making 6531. 12s. 8d. diftributed by the paymaster general of the forces in gratuities. The public voice unites with that of individuals, in demanding a fuppression of a species of emolument fo eafily perverted to purposes injurious to the interest of both.

But there is one other fort of gratuity, that requires particular obfervation; that is, what is paid to the officers and clerks in the pay office of the navy and army, for carrying on and making up the accounts of the treafurer and paymafter general after their refignation. It should feem, that in every office of accounts, the balancing the books every year, and as foon as possible after the expiration of that year, is a duty incumbent upon the perfons employed in that office; or difficulty, confusion, and ignorance of the real flate of their accounts, muft enfoe; it is an effential part of their conflant yearly bufineis, for which their annual flipends are or fhould be an alequate reward; and the prefiding officer is bound to fee that this bafinefs is done. Bat in these two offices a different fystem has prevailed: during the time the treafurer or paymafter general has continued in office, not one of his year's accounts has been ever made up; and it has been the intereft of the officers not to make them up ; if they had, it must have been confidered as part of their official buli-nefs, and paid for by their yearly emoluments; but, by delaying it for ten or fifteen years, they crave, on the ground of cullem, and obtain of the treafury, a special allowance for this bufinets, as for extra-fervice they were not bound The final accounts of to perform. Lord Holland, ending in June 1765, are at length near being clofed; and the treafury allowance for making them up has been craved and allowed. This recent transaction, completed fince the iffuing our precept for an account of these allowances, consists of the 03 memorial memorial to the treafury by the acting executor of Lord Holland; the diffribution of 11,320l. amingif the officers, and the fum of 3,6651. 10s. 6d. for incidental charges, craved by the memorial; and his majeily's warrant authorifing thefe allowances. If the profits of this office last year equalled the profits of the preceding year, as they probably did, the addition of this allowance would have increafed the actual net receipt of the whole office to 34 8811. 1s. 8d.; and that of the cafhier only to 9,8251. 19. 6d. and, if he had received all his fees, to 11,039l. 15S.

The memorial flates " thefe accounts to be intricate and voluminous, and to amount to above 45,900,000l.notwithflandingwhich they have been made up by the officers and clerks mentioned in the diffribution, without any expence to the public for additional affiitance or allowance." If they have been made up in the courfe of thefe last years, the load of annual current business in this office, during the time of Lord Holland, could have been no impediment to their being made up at that time, or foon after his refignation, and with much greater eafe, whilit the tranfactions were recent and fresh in their memories.

There fill remain to be made up the accounts of four treaturers of the navy, to the amount of 58,944,5881.; and of three paymatters general of the forces, amounting to 4,666,8751.; exclusive of the treaturer and paymaftergeneral in office; to the first of whom has been iffued, to the 30th of September, 1780, 16,781,2171. and to the latter, to the end of the fame year, 43,253,9111. and not one year's account of either are completed. So that of the money iffued to the navy, 75,725,8051.; and of the money iffued to the army 47,920,7861.together123,646,5911. (not including 10,647,1881. iffued to the navy, and 8,121,000l. to the army, to the end of the laft year) is as yet unaccounted for; and for the making up of thefe accounts, if this cuttom is fuffered to continue, nine more gratuities are to be craved of the public. How much then does it behove them that this evil foould be corrected !- An evil that furnishes another weighty reafon, in addition to those urged in our former reports, for proceeding immediately to bring forward the long arrears in the accounts of thefe offices, in order for their fpeedy completion,

Having thus flated the mifchiefs attending the prefent eftablifhment, both to the public and individuals, and the reafons for abolifhing the multifarious emoluments by which thefe offices are now fupported, it remains for us to propofe fuch a regulation, as appears best calculated to avoid the like mifchiefs, and most beneficial to the public fervice.

We are of opinion, that in the place of all thefe falaries, fees, and gratuities, there fhould be fubflituted and annexed to each of thefe offices, of whatever rank or denomination, one certain falary, paid to the officer by the public quarterly, and free of all deductions : this falary fhould be an ample compenfation for the fervice required; and the quantum effimated by the various qualifications and circumflances neceffary for the execution, cution, and which, together, form the title to reward.

By this regulation the officer will know his income, the public will know their expence, and uniformity and equality will be introduced in the provisions for officers of equal rank and station in similar offices. The industry of fome perfons requires the spur of profits continually flowing in, or the hopes of increase: others prefer the certainty of a known, fure income, paid at stated times. No arrangement can fuit the difpolitions or occasions of all men; but time and ufage will foon reconcile one reafonable rule, extended through thefe departments of government.

Notwithstanding this regulation throws upon the public the whole expence of thefe offices, which are at prefent supported in part by individuals, yet, by adopting it, that whole expence will become lefs than the fum it now coffs the public; for that fum is fo great as to afford every liberal falary, and vet leave no inconfiderable faving. Not that this is the only faving propofed by the regulation : the public at prefent bear a much greater fhare of the burthen than is obvious at the first view. Belides fees and gratuities paid by public offices, and refunded to them out of public money, mary payments, though made by individuals, are charged by them ultimately to the account of the public. For inftance, the contractor, when he calculates the terms upon which he may fafely engage with government, must estimate every article of profit and lofs confequential to his bargain : to the account of the latter, he places all his charges, and amongst them the long catalogue of fees, certain and uncertain. The first he knows; the last he will calculate not to his own difadvantage; and if by them he can procure credit, or preference, or expedition, he will charge them to government at their full price. If this head of various expences was blotted out of his column of charges, by fo much would the terms of his contract be more favourable to the public.

But befides this, fo very various and extensive are the operations of government, that the number of perfons employed in their fervice conditute a very confiderable body of the people; and their relief is a public concern. If, by difcharging an office, at prefent paid by a falary, from those fees and deductions to which it is now fubject, that falary should become greater than the office ought in reason to have annexed to it, it may eafily be regulated, and reduced to its proper flandard.

We have faid the falary fhould be paid free of all deductions; that is, as far as is confiltent with the laws in being. The falaries and fees of office are at prefent subject, by three acts of parliament, to the land-tax, the fixponny, and the one fhilling duties. Whoever takes a view of the above state of the official profits, will not wonder they should be deemed by the legiflature a fit fubject of taxation; and, under the fythem then in ufe, no other mode of taxation couli well be contrived, but that adopted in those acts, though attended with inequality; and, in many cafes, with hardinip. Had one known falary been at that time the pay of office, and the neceffities of the flate required the aid of every fubject, in proportion to his faculties, it is poffible a diminution of the falary before it islued, might have appeared a more eligi-He, more equal, and lefs expenfive mode of taxation, than paying it entire out of the Exchequer, and then bringing back again a part of it, delayed and defalcated by a variety of deductions in its circuit; but, as it is, the fums at prefent affested upon these offices must c. stinue to be paid; because, otherwise, in the landtax, it will occasion a deficiency in the fum to be raifed by that division in which the office is affeffed; and, in the other duties, it will diminish the funds created by those acts, and confequently the fecurity of the creditors upon The land-tax and thofe funds. duties are now paid by the officers, at flated times, to the collectors and receivers. If the mode of payment by a clear falary is alopted, the total fum, now affeiied upon all the officers in one office, may fill continue to be paid as one fum, in like manner, out of the fame fund with the falaries themfelves.

We have faid the falaries fhould be annexed to the office : it ought to be a full and competent recompence for the execution, and no more. The whole of it ought to be paid to the perfon who executes, independent of the officer who prefides, but who fhould still retain the fame power of appointment, and the fame controul that he now exercifes over the inferior officer. Where the profits exceed what the officer is in reafon entitled to, the overplus should be abolished, and the public reap the benefit, not a perfon who earns no purt of it.

fome of the offices of the deputy paymatters abroad are finecures : though deputies themfelves, they execute thefe offices by their deputies, being themfelves engaged in very different employments under government.

Inflances are not wanting, in all thefe offices, to warrant this regulation of payment by a falary. The treafurer of the navy and his paymafter, the paymafter-general of the ferces, the paymafters of exchequer bills, and their officers, are all paid by falaries only; and why the fime rule may not be extended to the reft, no fufficient reason has hitherto occurred to us. It might feem too fanguine, to fuggelt how far this rule may be applied to other offices, without a previous examination into their peculiar circumstances; and yet the advantage it holds out to the public, its fimplicity, and aptitude to be accommodated to all offices, however diftinguished, afford great reafon to believe it may be applied to every department of government.

The principle of economy by which we have been guided, has led us to the conclusions we have formed, and the regulations we have fubmitted to the wifdom of parliament: conclusions firitly deduced from that principle, and regulations made neceflary by the prefing exigencies of the times.

Neither the danger of foreign war, nor the refignation of the duke of Brunfwick, ferve in any degree to ullay the ferment in Holland, or to reftore tranquillity to the Stadtholder's government.
